Mr. GEORGE. My colleague the senior Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS] is detained from the Senate because of illness. This announcement may stand for the day.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

The Senate will receive a message from the House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House insisted upon its amendment to the joint resolution (S. J. Res. 14) proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States fixing the commencement of the terms of President and Vice President and Members of Congress and fixing the time of the assembling of Congress, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and that Mr. JEFFERS, Mr. LOZIER, and Mr. GIFFORD were appointed managers on the part of the House at the conference.

The message also announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. J. Res. 292) to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to aid in the establishment of agricultural credit corporations, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 14) granting the consent of Congress for the temporary removal to the Corcoran Art Gallery of certain portraits in the Capitol Building.

The message also announced that the House had agreed to the following resolution:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
February 17, 1932.

Resolved, That the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 19) entitled "Concurrent resolution providing wreath to be placed on the grave of the mother of Washington on February 22, 1932," be, and the same is hereby, returned to the Senate pursuant to a resolution of the Senate requesting the return thereof.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED

The message further announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the enrolled bill (S. 1588) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to issue patents for lands held under color of title, and it was signed by the President pro tempore.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter in the nature of a petition from Ignatius K. Werwinski, of South Bend, Ind., praying for the passage of legislation providing that October 11 of each year be proclaimed as General Pulaski's Memorial Day, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted at Milwaukee, Wis., by the Associated General Contractors of America (Inc.), favoring the enactment of legislation to establish uniform requirements affecting Government contracts, and the prequalification of bidders, and protesting against the passage of legislation requiring in bids for Government work the names of subcontractors and suppliers of material, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate resolutions adopted by the Woman's Christian Temperance Unions of Kahoka, Mo., and of Harford County, Havre de Grace, Md., protesting against the resubmission of the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution to be ratified by State conventions or legislatures, and favoring the making of adequate appropriations for law enforcement and education in law observance, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also laid before the Senate a resolution adopted by the Board of Supervisors of Mendocino County, Calif., favoring the passage of legislation amending the prohibition law so as to permit the manufacture, sale, distribution, and consumption of 4 per cent beer, which was referred to the Committee on Manufactures.

Mr. BROOKHART presented a petition of sundry citizens of Wapello County, Iowa, praying that adequate appropriations be made for the maintenance of the military defenses of the country, including the national rifle matches, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. BARBOUR presented resolutions adopted by Freedom Council, No. 36, of Keyport; Pride of Belleville Council, No. 215, of Belleville; and Pride of Mechanics' Home Council, No. 61, of Jamesburg, Sons and Daughters of Liberty, in the State of New Jersey, favoring the passage of the bill (H. R. 1967) to provide for exclusion and expulsion of alien communists, which were referred to the Committee on Immigration.

Mr. FRAZIER presented the memorial of Mrs. Mary Dokken and 49 other citizens, of Palermo, N. Dak., remonstrating against the passage of legislation providing for the closing of barber shops on Sunday in the District of Columbia, or any other restrictive religious measures, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented the petition of C. C. Converse and 104 other citizens of Bismarck, N. Dak., praying for the maintenance of the prohibition law and its enforcement, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BLAINE presented a resolution adopted by Group No. 1553 of the Polish National Alliance, of Milwaukee, Wis., favoring the passage of legislation requesting the President to proclaim October 11 in each year as General Pulaski's memorial day, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Evangelical Adult Sunday School of Ripon, Wis., protesting against the proposed resubmission of the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution to be ratified by State conventions or legislatures, and favoring the making of adequate appropriations for law enforcement and education in law observance, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CAPPER presented petitions, numerously signed by sundry citizens of Washington, D. C., praying for the passage of legislation to regulate the closing of barber shops on Sunday in the District of Columbia, known as the Copeland Sunday health bill, which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of Burlington, Effingham, and Minneapolis, in the State of Kansas, praying for the maintenance of the prohibition law and its enforcement, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the congregation of the First Baptist Church of Reading, the First Methodist Episcopal Church and Sunday school of Hutchinson, the Atlantean Brown Club, and the Methodist Church and Sunday school, both of Minneapolis, all in the State of Kansas, favoring the maintenance of the prohibition law and its enforcement, and protesting its proposed modification or repeal, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. COPELAND presented petitions of sundry citizens of Round Lake, Malta, Niagara Falls, and Sinclairville, all in the State of New York, praying for the maintenance of the prohibition law and its enforcement, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the First Methodist Episcopal Church Sunday School of Buffalo; the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Port Jefferson; the First Baptist Sunday School of Springfield Center; the Sunday Morning Meeting of the Wilson Methodist Episcopal Church, of Wilson; Vestal Grange, No. 1073 (Inc.), of Vestal; and the Woman's Christian Temperance Unions of Glens Falls, Livingston, Oneonta, Elmira, Clyde, Johnstown, Amsterdam, and the Niagara Union of Buffalo, all in the State of New York, protesting against the resubmission of the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution to be ratified by State conventions or legislatures, and favoring the making of adequate appropriations for law enforcement and education in law observance, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented resolutions adopted by groups of the Polish National Alliance, of Amsterdam, Dunkirk, and Buffalo, N. Y., favoring the passage of legislation providing that October 11 in each year be proclaimed as General Pulaski's memorial day, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of the Folsom Men's Club, of the Folsom Avenue Methodist Episcopal Church, of Glendale, Long Island, N. Y., remonstrating against the proposed reduction in the salaries of postal employees, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Fleet Reserve Association, Queens Branch, No. 35, of Jamaica, N. Y., favoring the passage of legislation providing for the building of the Navy up to the Washington and London treaties strength, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Brooklyn and New York City, N. Y., praying for the passage of legislation to prohibit the vivisection of dogs in the District of Columbia, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of Otego, Glenham, Fishkill, and Beacon, all in the State of New York, remonstrating against the passage of legislation providing for the closing of barber shops on Sunday in the District of Columbia or any other restrictive religious measures, which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a petition of the Nassau County Chapter of the American Association of University Women, of New York State, praying for the passage of Senate bill 572, providing Federal aid for maternal and infant hygiene, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a resolution adopted by Nathan Hale Council, No. 113, Sons and Daughters of Liberty, in the State of New York, favoring the passage of legislation providing for the deportation of undesirable aliens, which was referred to the Committee on Immigration.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the New York Branch of the National Customs Service Association, of New York City, N. Y., protesting against any reduction in the salaries of Federal employees, which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service.

He also presented petitions of the Flushing (N. Y.) Peace Society, and members of the Nassau Chapter, American Association of University Women, in the State of New York, praying for the prompt ratification of the World Court protocols, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Association of 100 Per Cent United States Women of New York City, N. Y., favoring the retention of the sovereignty of the United States without alien interference from any source, which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a resolution adopted by the Home Market Club, of Boston, Mass., favoring the passage of House bill 8688, to equalize tariff duties by compensating for depreciation in foreign currencies, which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the memorial and executive committees, United Spanish War Veterans, Borough of Brooklyn, N. Y., protesting against any reduction in personnel of the armed forces of the United States, and favoring the passage of legislation to build the Navy up to the London treaty strength, which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

PROPOSED TARIFF ON CRUDE OIL

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, I present a petition addressed to the President of the United States and to the two branches of Congress signed by numerous citizens of Kentucky asking for the imposition of a tariff on oil. I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD without the signatures after the first two, as follows:

To His Excellency the Hon. Herbert Hoover, President of the United States of America, the United States Senate, and the House of Representatives:

We, the undersigned citizens of the southern part of the State of Kentucky, do hereby petition and request that you use your influence and thereby cause a reasonable tariff, sufficient to make the cost even with the cost of production to produce crude oil in the United States, on all foreign-produced crude oil.

We would represent that the oil industry in the State of Kentucky was, up until recently, one of the greatest industries we had in the State of Kentucky, but since the great flow of production in foreign countries and in view of the fact that their production is so much greater than ours and so much more cheaply produced, our oil industry, considering the cost to produce our oil, has had to fail, and since the failure of our oil industry in the State of Kentucky and as a result thereof, the oil people are out of business, and all the employees of oil people and oil companies, and the natural result is a loss to unemployed and a lot of misery, want, and woe, and we feel like if the oil business in the State of Kentucky was given this protection that it would again be one of the greatest industries the State of Kentucky has ever had and would help to eliminate, as much as any one thing, the great depression now on.

We earnestly urge and pray that you use your influence and see that this protection is given to us.

W. M. BACK,
President Wayne Co. Oil and Gas Association.
D. C. BYERS (and others).

Mr. WAGNER presented resolutions adopted by the Motor Truck Association of America, protesting against the proposed imposition of a tariff tax on crude oil, which were referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Whereas Senate bill No. 3 places a tariff on crude petroleum and other petroleum extracts, including gasoline, and the enactment of this legislation will increase the retail price of gasoline 4 cents a gallon; and

Whereas gasoline bears the highest tax ratio to its price of any necessity of such widespread use in the United States; and

Whereas it is contemplated, according to reports in the daily press, that many States, as well as the Federal Government, are considering emergency additional taxes on gasoline to balance their budgets; and

Whereas the owners of motor trucks, which comprise one-eighth of the registrations of motor vehicles in the United States, are now paying 35 per cent of the gasoline taxes paid in the United States, and the additional tax which will then be imposed upon them by an increase in the retail price of gasoline of approximately 4 cents per gallon will amount to approximately $200,000,000 a year: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Motor Truck Association of America (Inc.) vigorously oppose the imposition of such an unjust tax in view of the very high percentage of motor-vehicle taxes that motor-truck operators are already paying; and therefore be it further

Resolved, That the Motor Truck Association of America (Inc.) use every effort within its power to prevent the passage of such unjustified legislation.

DISARMAMENT AND WORLD PEACE

Mr. WAGNER presented a resolution addressed to the American delegates to the Geneva Disarmament Conference, adopted at a mass meeting at Temple Israel, Lawrence, Long Island, N. Y., which was referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEBRUARY 2, 1932.

To the American delegates to the Geneva Disarmament Conference:

The following resolution was unanimously adopted at a mass meeting held on Tuesday, February 2, 1932, at Temple Israel, Lawrence, Long Island, at which there were present representatives of all religious, civic, and educational organizations in the communities of Far Rockaway, Inwood, Lawrence, Cedarhurst, Woodmere, and Hewlett, Long Island, N. Y., as follows: Sage Memorial Church; parent-teachers' associations; St. Mary's Star of the Sea Church; St. John's Parish House; Methodist Churches; Trinity Parish; Women's International League for Peace, Far Rockaway; congregation of Shaaray Tefila; Temple Beth El; Temple Israel:

"Whereas the hope and prayer for peace has ever been stressed throughout the centuries and has been a part of the teachings of all spiritual geniuses throughout the ages; and

"Whereas at this critical time in world relations we believe that it is imperative that all organizations, of whatever denomination, assembled for purposes of civic, religious, and spiritual development, should take a clean-cut and positive position against war; and

"Whereas the continuation of civilization is incompatible with war and great armaments are incompatible with peace; and

"Whereas a conference is now being held at Geneva, composed of delegates of all the nations of the world, to bring about a material reduction in war expenditures as a contribution toward permanent peace and the welfare of the world, which conference has been preceded by years of preparation, and the time is now ripe for further action: Now, therefore, we, the residents of the several communities above mentioned, affiliated with the aforesaid religious, civic, and educational organizations, in mass meeting assembled, at Temple Israel, Lawrence, N. Y., on February 2, 1932, hereby

"Resolve, That this is an opportune time for real results in your deliberations; that we look to you in confidence, as our representatives, to assume leadership to bring about further progress in the solution of the problems of disarmament; we recognize that compromise and sacrifices may be required; we know that you will be courageous in your desire for peace, and in order that limitation of armaments and security to all nations may be brought about; that a world aflame shall never return to this earth; that this danger must be prevented; that mutual aims can be found whereby understandings may be reached and conditions for world peace realized and established; that these issues press for solution upon mankind as never before in human history; we know that you will be eager to do whatever can be done in order that the curse of war shall be lifted from the earth; that you urge and champion the reduction and limitation of armaments to become effective; we know that you will contribute to the success of the conference, to the end that the first epoch-making step upon the highway of world peace and comity may become a fact; and we further

"Resolve, That a copy of this resolution be forwarded to the President of the United States, to the United States Senators representing the State of New York, and to the Congressman in the House of Representatives representing this district, as well as to the American delegates at Geneva."

THE PROHIBITION QUESTION

Mr. WAGNER. I present a resolution adopted by the Perry Baptist Sunday School, of Perry, N. Y., favoring prohibition, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and appropriately referred.

There being no objection, the resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the United States Senate:

Whereas the eighteenth amendment was adopted by the orderly processes of government and has been sustained by no less than 48 decisions of the United States Supreme Court; and

Whereas its opponents are now asking Congress to resubmit the question of prohibition through a repeal amendment to be ratified by State conventions called for that purpose; and

Whereas we have no reason to believe that those opponents who have not counseled obedience to the eighteenth amendment and its enforcement act and those who have openly advocated disobedience and disregard of the same, which is selective anarchy, would change their attitude and accept the vote of the majority of States should the repeal amendment fail of ratification; and

Resolved, That we are opposed to the resubmission of the eighteenth amendment to be ratified by State conventions or by State legislatures, and that we ask our Congressman from this district and our United States Senators to vote against such a resolution and to vote for adequate appropriations for law enforcement and for education in law observance.

Adopted by adult department, Perry Baptist Sunday School.
Representing over 100 people.
Dated February 7, 1932, Perry, N. Y.
(Also by M. E. School.)

UNEMPLOYMENT AND BUILDING PROGRAM

Mr. WAGNER. I also present two resolutions adopted by the New York State Building Trades Council, which I ask may be printed in the RECORD and lie on the table.

There being no objection, the resolutions were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ALBANY, N. Y., February 15, 1932.

Hon. ROBERT F. WAGNER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The following resolution was adopted by the executive board of the New York State Building Trades Council at a meeting held in Albany, N. Y., on February 13, 1932:

"Whereas loaning money to railroads will not create traffic, a public-works program will, by creating orders for the material that goes into construction. This material must be transported.

"Whereas loaning money to corporations that produce building material will not create a market for what they have to sell, a construction project will.

"Resolved, That the New York State Building Trades Council, through its representatives in Congress, respectfully petition the Congress of the United States to pass the compromise appropriation bill to relieve unemployment and distress; it is our opinion that until the unemployed are put back to work you can not return prosperity."

Very truly yours,

EDWARD ACKERLEY,
Secretary-Treasurer New York State Building Trades Council.

Whereas the Federal Employment Stabilization Board has been preparing plans and specifications for construction projects, and the plans are in readiness;

Whereas congressional authorization has been given and the next step is for the President to submit the estimates to Congress for the money required to carry the work forward: Therefore, be it

Resolved, That the New York State Building Trades Council urge Senator WAGNER and Senator COPELAND to ask for immediate action by the Senate calling on the President to start the Federal construction program.

REMONETIZATION OF SILVER

Mr. WHEELER presented an editorial from the Wallace (Idaho) Press-Times, issue of Monday, February 1, 1932, on the silver question, which was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Wallace (Idaho) Press-Times of February 1, 1932]

BIMETALISM OR BOLSHEVISM

On the mines page will be found the first of four installments giving in full the speech which Senator WHEELER, of Montana, delivered a week ago in the United States Senate advocating the adoption of his bill remonetizing silver on a basis of 16 to 1. The condition which Senator WHEELER describes deserves the attention of every right-thinking citizen. The specter of 7,000,000 unemployed, along with an abundance of farm products and an overproduction of raw materials and manufactured articles, will not be downed by appropriations from Congress, increasing the taxpayers' burden. History shows that bread lines and business failures are the forerunners of social unrest and political upheaval. Remonetization of silver is the only procedure which guarantees quick relief from the present intolerable era of ruin and disintegration.

The cause of silver—meaning the restoration to statutory parity with gold—is the cause of humanity, nationally and internationally. The gold standard has failed; 24 nations have abandoned it. Senator WHEELER has made the case for silver. You are urged to read and study the four installments of his speech, then act accordingly. Write or wire your representatives in Congress your indorsement of the Wheeler bill.

DELAWARE RIVER JOINT COMMISSION

Mr. DAVIS presented a letter from Hon. Edward Martin, State treasurer of Pennsylvania, relative to the Delaware River Joint Commission, and also a letter from Hon. Gifford Pinchot, Governor of Pennsylvania, on the same subject, which were ordered to lie on the table and to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA,
OFFICE OF STATE TREASURER,
Harrisburg, February 11, 1932.

Hon. JAMES J. DAVIS,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: May I respectfully call your attention to a resolution now before Congress approving the agreement between the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania and the State of New Jersey creating the Delaware River Joint Commission, and further to request your active aid and support of this measure. It is extremely important financially both to the Commonwealth and to the city of Philadelphia that favorable action be obtained at Washington in order that the Delaware River Joint Commission, of which I am a member, may proceed with its contemplated financing whereby Pennsylvania and Philadelphia will each be repaid nearly $10,000,000 and the State of New Jersey nearly $13,000,000 as their respective investments in the Delaware River Bridge.

This financing can not be completed until congressional approval is obtained, according to the banking syndicates which plan to bid for the bonds. The bankers hold that any agreement entered into between two States must have the formal approval of Congress.

Congress on February 15, 1921, granted permission to the Delaware River Bridge Joint Commission for the construction and operation of the bridge across the Delaware River between Philadelphia and Camden. Last year Pennsylvania and New Jersey reorganized the commission as the Delaware River Joint Commission, "a body corporate and politic," and turned over to it the operation and revenues of the bridge with power to borrow money upon its bonds, from the proceeds of which repayment would be made to Pennsylvania, New Jersey, and Philadelphia. The commission was authorized to construct facilities for high-speed rail transit between Philadelphia and Camden by way of the bridge. No power was given to the commission to levy taxes or to pledge the credit of Pennsylvania or New Jersey.

The resolution now before Congress specifically provides that nothing therein shall affect or impair the powers or jurisdiction of the United States in regard to the Delaware River and commerce between the States.

Formal approval by Congress would be highly beneficial to our State, and your cooperation will be most welcome.

With kind personal regards, I am, very sincerely,

EDWARD MARTIN.

COMMONWEALTH OF PENNSYLVANIA,
GOVERNOR'S OFFICE,
Harrisburg, January 26, 1932.

Hon. JAMES J. DAVIS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR JIM: Many thanks for your letter inquiring whether Pennsylvania has any objection to Senate Joint Resolution 41, granting the consent of Congress to the compact or agreement between Pennsylvania and New Jersey creating the Delaware River Joint Commission.

Pennsylvania is extremely interested in having this resolution passed as speedily as possible. Its passage is necessary to enable bonds to be issued which will repay to the State and to the city of Philadelphia their respective investments in the construction of the Camden-Philadelphia Bridge.

Sincerely yours,

GIFFORD PINCHOT.

CONTROL OF THE CORN BORER

Mr. DAVIS presented a letter from Hon. John A. McSparran, secretary of agriculture of Pennsylvania, relative to the control of the corn borer in the United States, which, with the accompanying table, was referred to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE,
Harrisburg, February 16, 1932.

Hon. JAMES J. DAVIS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR DAVIS: I recognize that the United States Government will have to cut down the appropriation that has heretofore gone toward control of the corn borer in the United States. However, I do not believe it is wise, unless it is absolutely necessary that it should be cut as much as two-thirds. If, however, it must be cut two-thirds, the main objection that we have to the way the bill passed the House is that the money is earmarked for scouting work.

I am inclosing you a tabulation which indicates, I think you will agree, that we have kept the corn borer under control in the State of Pennsylvania. We have done the most of the scouting, as I understand it, and the United States Government has helped to maintain the quarantine. They are splendidly fitted to handle the quarantine, and we feel that this coming season especially the quarantine should by all means be maintained rather than the scouting for the reason that New Jersey has a corn borer which breeds twice in the season, and that is just across the river from the main corn belt of the State of Pennsylvania, which is in southeastern Pennsylvania.

I do hope, therefore, that whatever money the United States Government appropriates to corn-borer work that the Congress will not earmark it so that we shall be compelled to have it used in Pennsylvania for scouting purposes, when we feel absolutely sure that our main problem is the quarantine, and I will appreciate it if you can bring this matter directly to the attention of the proper people.

Sincerely yours,

JOHN A. MCSPARRAN,
Secretary of Agriculture.

PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

Mr. CUTTING. Mr. President, I have a statement submitted by the Philippine Commission which I ask to have printed in the RECORD, and also referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs.

There being no objection, the statement was referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT SUBMITTED BY THE PHILIPPINE COMMISSION TO THE COMMITTEE ON TERRITORIES AND INSULAR AFFAIRS, UNITED STATES SENATE, ON THE VIEWS EXPRESSED BY THE SECRETARY OF WAR IN HIS TESTIMONY ON PHILIPPINE INDEPENDENCE

The War Department being the administrative branch of the United States Government directly charged with the supervision of Philippine affairs, the statement made by the Secretary of War before this committee can not but command careful attention. Hence the Philippine Commission, after analyzing it conscientiously, considers it its duty to express its views on the important points brought out in his testimony. This the commission will do with frankness and without equivocation, sincere in its purpose to aid this committee in arriving at definite and just conclusions.

The Philippine Commission is in substantial accord with Secretary Hurley upon the following fundamental facts:

1. The validity of the title of the United States to the Philippine Islands precisely as granted by the treaty of Paris and a later supplementary treaty. It should be added, however, that the treaty of Paris left to the Congress of the United States the determination of the future status of the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands.

2. The American policy in the Philippines represents a new conception in dealing with subject peoples, its purpose being not exploitation but "to introduce and develop the basic conceptions of free government." The aim has always been, as President Roosevelt stated, "to make them fit for self-government after the fashion of really free nations."

3. Independence has always been the objective of American policy in the Philippines. The true and clear purport of this policy appears in the repeated declarations of authorized officials, especially Presidents of the United States, and in the congressional commitment contained in the Jones Act. Philippine independence is more than a mere policy; it is a solemn promise made by the United States to the people of the Philippine Islands, which must be fulfilled.

4. From the inception of American sovereignty in the Philippines the powers of government have been gradually transferred to Filipino officials, until at the present time the government is in a very large degree in their hands.

5. The people of the Philippine Islands, after more than 30 years of association with the United States, have demonstrated their capacity to govern themselves. In this connection it is only fair to note that Secretary Hurley qualifies this assertion with the remark that 40 per cent of the territory of the islands is inhabited by people who in their majority are non-Christians, and who have not attained the degree of political education which the Christian Filipinos have achieved. While this reference of Secretary Hurley is in a sense correct, it should be recalled that only a very small portion of the area mentioned by him is actually occupied by non-Christian Filipinos, and that more than 80 per cent of such area is unoccupied Government land.

It should also be noted that the non-Christian population of the Philippines is less than 9 per cent of the total population of the islands, and that the Christian population of the nine special provinces referred to by Secretary Hurley exceeds either the Mohammedans or Pagans in those provinces. Secretary Hurley places emphasis on the fact that the non-Christians are still represented by appointive representatives in the legislature. This is true. They are represented in the Philippine Legislature by 2 out of 24 members of the senate and by 9 appointive delegates out of a total membership of 97 in the lower house. But this fact should not be taken as the measure of the political capacity of these people. That their representatives are still appointive is neither their choice nor their desire. It is an arrangement established by the Congress of the United States which the Legislature of the Philippine Islands is without power to change. Secretary Hurley stated the truth when he affirmed in the course of his testimony that there are to-day among these people many well-educated men and women who could with credit represent them in the legislature.

On the basis of these undisputed facts, the political capacity of the whole Filipino people should not be questioned. Political capacity should be determined not by the level of enlightenment, experience, and capacity of a small minority of the population but rather by the average level reached by the majority of the people or the people as a whole.

6. The Filipino people are practically united in their desire for independence. Secretary Hurley, however, intimates that there are many among the non-Christian people who are opposed to it. He admits that the Christian Filipinos are more ready for self-government than the non-Christians. It is difficult to understand how Secretary Hurley can attribute strength and weight to expressions against independence among those who are less capable of understanding the consequences of independence, and at the same time deny the effectiveness of the desires of the bulk of the population who are better informed and more intelligent.

7. Great progress has been made in the Philippines not only in political preparation but in the advancement of education, sanitation, public improvements, and other lines of activity. It is also agreed that the Philippine government is sound financially and has a balanced budget. Philippine currency is on a stable basis. These achievements are the result of the joint efforts of Americans and Filipinos.

Having stated briefly the points upon which there is no controversy, we shall now proceed to examine the facts bearing upon the conclusions of Secretary Hurley with which we beg to disagree:

1. Secretary Hurley asserts that the promise of independence was conditioned by what he calls a composite objective, which includes capacity for self-government, economic independence, and high social standards. Secretary Hurley argues that all of these accomplishments not having been reached, the Filipino people should not be granted their independence now or in the near future. He adds that it is impossible to forecast when these conditions will be attained, and urged the view that the time when independence is to be granted must be determined by certain definite achievements which can not be established in advance.

An examination of American policy toward the Philippines will show that the capacity of the people to set up a stable government is the only condition imposed by the United States for their independence. Stable government has a well-defined and accepted meaning and does not include the special conditions which Secretary Hurley desires to impose on the Philippines. Stability of government does not require economic independence. It certainly does not include the maintenance of prosperous trade relationships with other countries of the world. It does not necessitate the absolute assurance of economic prosperity for the whole people, let alone freedom from economic difficulties incident upon political changes or from the all-too-common possible adverse effects resulting from the free play of economic laws. Economic independence or self-sufficiency has been reached by hardly any country in the world. Whether the Philippines, being largely an agricultural country, will soon reach self-sufficiency is a debatable question. But one thing is certain: The Philippines will not reach that stage while they remain under the American flag, living an artificial life, under artificial trade and other unstable economic arrangements, which are beyond the power or right of their people to influence or command. To attain economic stability, the Philippine nation, as soon as possible, must be placed on its own resources, with its people free to work out their own economic salvation in the competitive markets of the world. A postponement of their independence until balanced trade has been attained will surely add to their difficulties and problems when they are finally cut off from the American market. Moreover, it would also increase the difficulties which the change will bring about upon American trade with the Philippine Islands.

2. Secretary Hurley alleges with insistence that the Filipino leaders have not formulated an economic program for independence. This statement is incorrect. All the pleas for independence presented by Filipino representatives have always called the attention of Congress to the fact that to bring about a liquidation of American-Philippine trade relations without injury to the interest concerned or harm to the Philippine economic structure, once a definite time for independence is fixed, reasonable arrangements should be effected for the adjustment of economic relationships. Such a program is contained in the Hawes-Cutting bill and in the Hare bill, and its purpose is to maintain substantially the status quo as to the volume of reciprocal free trade with the United States for a period of five years, during which time it is believed economic conditions would be adjusted to meet the new situation which will prevail upon complete severance of political ties; more specifically, to allow Philippine industries now dependent upon the free American market a time for adjustment when they may be placed on a competitive basis. While this readjustment is taking place, production of articles not dependent on the American free market will necessarily receive an impetus. At the same time the Filipinos will have an opportunity to develop new markets for their export products. The result will be to stabilize economic conditions and permit of economic development on solid and lasting foundations.

What the effect of these temporary trade arrangements will be on the finances of the Philippine government will not be difficult to surmise. Should economic conditions in the islands be maintained until they can reasonably adjust themselves after independence, when the Philippines will find itself outside of the tariff walls of the United States, the Filipinos believe that they would then be at least as financially able to support their independent government as they now are. Moreover, should the new burdens and responsibilities, which independence will entail, require the expenditure of funds which are not now provided for, the Filipino people will undoubtedly be ready to increase the tax burdens they are at present carrying.

Beyond the scheme proposed in the Hawes-Cutting bill and in the Hare bill covering the economic relations during the intervening period prior to independence, it is not intelligently possible to formulate another program. Nor should it be required as a condition precedent to congressional action on these bills. No country in the past aspiring to its independence was required to have an economic program. The United States, upon the declaration of its independence, did not even consider such a problem. Cuba did not offer one before the withdrawal of American sovereignty.

Uninformed as the Filipinos are to-day of the terms and conditions upon which their independence may be granted, and of the time when the withdrawal of American sovereignty will actually take place, they are not now able to anticipate a hypothetical situation and take it as a basis upon which to formulate an economic program covering their industries, their trade, and the finances of their government.

With reference to the Philippine National Bank, Secretary Hurley asserted that independence in five years would produce its collapse, alleging that the bank now has frozen assets closely tied up with the sugar industry. The Hawes-Cutting bill or the Hare bill does not propose to kill the sugar industry in the Philippines.

It specifically provides for continued favorable conditions affecting the industry during the 5-year period. The sugar mills of the Philippines owe the national bank about 25,000,000 pesos. During the last five years these mills had paid to the bank 21,000,000 pesos on the capital and 15,000,000 pesos interest on the original indebtedness of 46,000,000 pesos. These figures will show that were present trade relations with the United States to continue for some time, the mills may be expected to pay on the capital indebtedness the same amount which they paid during the last five years, so that at the end of the 5-year period the mills would only be indebted to the bank in the amount of about 5,000,000 pesos.

Secretary Hurley also mentions the fact that the withdrawal of the American Army from the Philippines would reduce the circulation of the islands by $12,000,000 a year. By what course of reasoning Secretary Hurley arrives at this conclusion is difficult to understand. In the first place, the United States Army does not spend $12,000,000 a year in the islands. An examination of the official records will show that the amount actually spent in the Philippines for salaries and supplies purchased in the Philippines is much less. This suspension of such expenditures would not necessarily affect the circulation of the Philippines any more than a reduction in an equal amount of the value of Philippine exports to the United States. What will result will be a proportional reduction in the value of the imports from the United States to the Philippines.

The Filipino leaders are not unaware of all the elements which enter into the Philippine question. They have taken pains to view them in their true aspects and to inform their people of their significance. The Filipino people understand that independence will bring about a termination of reciprocal free-trade relations with the United States. They know it may produce economic hardships and increase tax burdens, but they are prepared to meet the responsibilities which will devolve upon them.

3. Secretary Hurley, as far as can be deduced from his testimony, considers the economic unpreparedness of the islands as the one great obstacle to independence. He is positive in his belief that economic readiness can only be brought about through the achievement of a balanced trade with the United States. It is difficult to understand how the balancing of commercial exchange between the United States and the Philippines would make the islands any more prepared for their independence than they are to-day. The result that would follow political separation, namely, the disruption of free-trade reciprocity, would injure Philippine and American trade as much if a balanced trade existed, as it would at present. If at all, the difference would be that at the end of a long period of years necessary to bring about a balanced trade the Philippines might be involved in greater difficulties because of increased production of commodities now enjoying protection in the American market, or the stimulation of other products equally protected and which are not now being produced.

4. Secretary Hurley maintains with great insistence the impossibility of fixing a definite time for independence, because he claims that it is beyond the vision of practical men to map out a satisfactory economic program which could be successfully terminated in a stated period. With this view we can not agree. If the objective is clear and well defined, certainly it is not impossible to formulate a program and a stated time for its achievement. Accepting the opinion of Secretary Hurley that the sudden termination of the privileges which Philippine products now enjoy would bring about the collapse of some of the most important industries in the Philippines and result in economic depression in the islands, it would seem plain that what the Philippines really need is the fixing of a definite time for independence so that a proper adjustment to the new conditions which will obtain after independence may be made. The normal operation of economic laws would require a definite period. Besides, without such a period it would be difficult to expect this readjustment to take place, for it would only be natural for the Filipinos not to exert themselves for its attainment until a definite date is fixed for the change that is to eventuate. Leaving the future political status undecided will merely prolong the existing uncertainty, which is not conducive either to economic stability or to the solution of the economic intricacies of the present situation.

The theory of definite accomplishments is so vague and so uncertain as to give no hope of successful results. It will satisfy no one who desires a definite settlement of the Philippine problem and will not pave the way for the solution of the economic difficulties which confront the Filipino people. Instead of disentangling the Philippines from the economic system of the United States it will merely involve the islands in a closer artificial relationship with the United States which can not be terminated at any future time without serious injury to both countries. On the other hand, with the determination of a fixed time when the Philippines shall be placed outside of the tariff walls of the United States, merchants and producers of both countries are informed of the change that will occur. In this case we would only need a reasonable time to prepare ourselves for the change in order to escape avoidable consequences.

5. Secretary Hurley makes repeated protestations of a sincere desire to bring about the independence of the Philippines. However, this deep concern for the future welfare and security of the Filipinos is such that were his expectations and fears to be accepted it would be fair to state that the Philippine Islands would never attain their independence. He desires, for example, to elevate the social standards and the political and economic capacity of the non-Christian Filipinos at least to the same levels attained by the Christian Filipinos. Under American sovereignty such a task would require many generations. And even then it would be doubtful if the Mohammedan Filipinos would ever attain social standards which Secretary Hurley might consider satisfactory, for their religious and moral conceptions are different from Christian civilization.

Secretary Hurley also would require the Philippine Islands to build up a system of military and naval defense which would make them impregnable against foreign aggression. There are very few countries in the world to-day which are in such a strong position. Frankly, if this condition were imposed upon the Filipino people, it would be tantamount to a denial of our independence. Ability to maintain a naval and military establishment adequate to withstand aggression from without is not now possessed by the Filipino people, and they will not be able to develop such a system of defense for many years to come. But there are to-day in the world influences and instrumentalities, other than military force, which are deemed sufficient for the preservation of national integrity, and the Filipino people have the right to rely on them. Recent happenings in China should not be cited to justify assumptions as to what will happen in an independent Philippines five years from now. The two countries are differently situated and the cross interests and conflicting purposes of other nations bearing on China happily do not obtain as regards the Philippines.

6. Great emphasis is laid by Secretary Hurley on what he terms the special responsibility which the United States Government assumed with respect to the Mohammedan Filipinos. He claims that when the United States forces disarmed the Moros they were given assurances that the United States would exercise tutelage over them until they were able to defend their rights and, besides, to protect them against what he calls their "hereditary enemies," the Christian Filipinos. Secretary Hurley could hardly have cited a fact more lacking in historical foundation or more widely divergent from the views of those who have been most intimately associated with both Mohammedan and Christian Filipinos and the events referred to. The Mohammedan Filipinos were disarmed, about 5,000 rifles having been gathered from them, as the Christian Filipinos had previously been disarmed. No apologies were made for this action of the Government, and certainly no promises were proffered. General Pershing, Governor General Forbes, and former Gov. Frank W. Carpenter, of the department of Mindanao and Sulu, are witnesses to this fact, and the denials of such promises appear in the official records of the Government. The United States did not assume any obligation toward the Mohammedan Filipinos differing from that which it assumed as regards the Christian Filipinos. As to the alleged traditional animosity between the Mohammedan and the Christian Filipinos, it is very unfortunate that Secretary Hurley should share in the belief of its existence. The truth is different. If religion is the barrier to complete understanding between the two elements, it is easy to see that the Mohammedan Filipinos would be as distrustful of American Christians as they are of Filipino Christians. The real fact is that no such animosity exists, and that Mohammedan and Christian Filipinos, belonging as they do to the same race and conscious as they are of a common destiny, to-day feel that they are part of the same nation, which it is their privilege and duty both to support and to govern.

7. Secretary Hurley, who persistently refused to fix a date for independence on the ground that he is not a prophet is not, however, disinclined to prophesy disaster, chaos, anarchy, and even revolution in the Philippines if independence were granted. He cites no facts and gives no reasons in the course of his testimony which would justify such gloomy forebodings. We claim to know our people better and to be, at least, as familiar as Secretary Hurley with the economic and social conditions obtaining in our country. We are not burdened with such pessimism. We fear no revolution. The history of our people is sufficient to allay such fear. The Filipinos are law-abiding and have learned to accept the decision of the majority. No spirit of sectionalism or class divides them. Through democratic practices for almost a generation now they have learned to settle their national problems at the polls. Anarchy and revolution are most improbable. And why should there be such upheavals? Let us accept the worst that may happen, because of sudden economic changes. Let us admit, for the sake of argument, that the foreign trade of the islands would be wiped out and hat the exportable products can not find a profitable market either in the United States or elsewhere. Undoubtedly such a condition would result in serious difficulties and great hardships for the Filipino people. But unemployment, hunger, and starvation will not follow in their wake. The Philippines is an agricultural country. Its people possess the natural resiliency of a tropical people to changing economic conditions. A very large percentage of the Filipino people are land owners and own their homes. They also have opportunities of acquiring lands which they may cultivate and develop to satisfy their wants. But if depressed conditions must come and the Filipinos must pay the price which other nations have paid before they were permitted to enjoy fully the blessings of national independence, the Filipino people should not be denied the opportunity to pay that price.

SUGGESTIONS OF SECRETARY HURLEY

Secretary Hurley proposed that the Filipino people be not now informed as to their political future, and, thus, would continue the present uncertainty which not only hampers their progress but shakes their spirit and makes them despair of their liberty. He does not propose to settle the question of independence. He merely hints that sometime, ultimately, it may be granted. Immediately, however, he proposes that congressional action be taken limiting the free entry of Philippine products into the United States, and also Philippine immigration into continental United States. This is the first time since the American occupation of the islands that such a proposal has come from an authoritative official branch of the American Government. It is not only contrary to the avowed American policy of altruism in the Philippines but is diametrically opposed to the position heretofore taken on this question by the War Department, by the Governors General of the Philippines, and by every American administration. It will deprive the Filipinos of priceless privileges and rights which they now enjoy under the American flag, the withdrawal of which could not but be interpreted by them as both unjust and discriminatory.

But Secretary Hurley is not satisfied with these limitations on Philippine freedom and the curtailment of their rights and trade. He proposes to maintain in the Philippines an unrestricted market for American products and manufactures. He goes farther. He would compel the Philippines to revise their tariff laws so as to impose higher duties on articles coming from foreign countries and thus force increased consumption of American products by the Filipino people. Such a scheme, if carried out, would embark the United States on a policy of exploitation of the Philippines.

The adoption of these steps without at the same time fixing a definite date for the independence of the Philippines is a reversal of America's traditional policy and the inauguration of a new policy, that of permanent retention and subjugation of the Filipino people. It is true that Secretary Hurley, in answer to certain criticisms of his proposed policy, recognized that such steps as he proposed could justly be considered politically unmoral if they were not adopted as steps preparatory to independence. On the other hand, unless a definite date were fixed the approval of the program outlined by Secretary Hurley would lead the Philippines away from, not nearer to, their coveted liberty, while at the same time strait-jacketing their economic development and trade for an indefinite period. Certainly the mere expectation of ultimate independence as described by Secretary Hurley is too vague and indefinite to offer a justification for such drastic impositions upon the Filipino people.

Secretary Hurley couples his trade proposals with the hint of an enlargement of Filipino participation in their governmental affairs. This can not satisfy the Filipinos. It will not justify the injurious restrictions which it is sought to impose on their trade and the right of Filipino citizens freely to enter the United States. But even this offer of increased participation in government administration is difficult to understand and will be misconstrued. For the offer is limited by Secretary Hurley as follows: "Provided it involves no surrender of any authority now possessed by the American Government." Government authority is a definable and fixed measure of political power. It is impossible to increase the participation of one element without reducing the authority of the other. It is difficult to discern how Philippine participation can be increased without reducing that which the American Government now exercises. Reference to this proposal is made here not that it is of any importance in the discussion of this question of independence but merely because it offers one additional reason to support the view that the proposal of Secretary Hurley is impracticable and unjust, is meaningless in its political phase, and highly injurious to Philippine interests in its economic aspects. It can not be acceptable to the people of the Philippine Islands.

CONCLUSION

The analysis of the testimony of Secretary Hurley shows that both the plan and the provisions of the Hawes-Cutting bill in the Senate and the Hare bill in the House of Representatives provide a sound and statesmanlike solution of the question of Philippine independence. These bills courageously and without any attempt at evasion or postponement of fundamental issues solve the Philippine problem in conformity with American policy, in accord with Filipino aspirations, and with proper safeguards for their political, social, and economic interests.

A fair and impartial consideration of the facts bearing on the Philippine question, even only of those which are not disputed by Secretary Hurley, will justify the enactment of a measure granting the Philippines its independence, as was promised in the Jones Act. The Filipino people are confident that such action will be taken.

Respectfully submitted.

INDEPENDENT BIMETALLISM

Mr. WHEELER presented an article appearing in the Oklahoma Union Farmer, Oklahoma City, Okla., in its issue of February 1, 1932, entitled "Independent Bimetallism," which was referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Oklahoma Union Farmer, of Oklahoma City, Okla., issue of February 1, 1932]

INDEPENDENT BIMETALLISM

Jonathan Bourne, jr., former United States Senator and for 10 years president of the Republican Publicity Association, gives out the following statement:

"Senator WHEELER's bill, S. 2487, introduced January 4, to establish a bimetallic system of currency employing gold and silver, to fix the relative value of gold and silver, to provide for the free coinage of silver as well as gold, and for other purposes, is, in my opinion, the most important measure from an economic standpoint that has been introduced in Congress during the present century.

"Its enactment into law would do more to help extricate the United States and the rest of the world from our present economic chaos than all other suggestions, if same were adopted, that have thus far emanated from our present Executive, members of his Cabinet, political economists, and so-called captains of big industry that I have thus far seen or heard of.

"Understanding that the United States Department of Agriculture estimates the value of last year's agricultural products to be approximately $4,000,000,000, I unhesitatingly assert that had this bill of Senator WHEELER's been enacted into law a year ago more than $10,000,000,000 would have been added to the four billions of estimated value of last year's agricultural products and that all classes of our society and all producers of raw and manufactured products in this country would have been increasingly benefited.

"In studying this and the monetary question it is well to learn that while all money is a medium of exchange, primary money only is the measure of value.

"For many centuries the only primary moneys known in the world have been gold and silver.

"I respectfully urge any and all readers of this article to immediately request their Senators and Members of Congress to forward them copies of the Wheeler bill, S. 2487, and also copies of Senator WHEELER's speech when delivered (which I understand he expects to deliver in the Senate within the next 10 days) containing his arguments demonstrating the desirability of the enactment into law of his bill establishing a bimetallic system of currency in the United States.

"After receipt and careful study of the bill and speech, if convinced by the latter that the proposed legislation is absolutely sound and would be beneficial to all classes of our society, form bimetallic clubs in their various communities; get their various agricultural, labor, and commercial organizations to discuss and pass resolutions requesting their representatives in both branches of Congress to carry out the mandates set forth in said resolutions for support or opposition to the enactment of this legislation.

"Remember that the free coinage of both silver and gold as provided by the act of 1792 was continued to 1873, although the ratio between gold and silver coins was changed from 15 to 1 as fixed by the act of 1792, to 16 to 1 by the act of 1834, and to 15.988 to 1 by the act of 1837.

"Further, note that from and including the years 1801 to 1850 the average gold-silver price ratio was 15.7, while the average silver-gold production ratio for the entire world was 28.0.

"Also note that from the period of 1851 to 1875, both inclusive, the average gold-silver price ratio was 15.5, while the silver-gold production ratio was 6.7.

"The fact that Great Britain adopted gold monometallism in 1816, France in the 1850's, Germany in 1871, in conjunction with the above-stated average in gold-silver price ratio, together with the world's silver-gold production ratios from 1801 to 1875, prove conclusively the ability of the United States by independent action in the enactment of the Wheeler bill, S. 2487, to maintain the parity of 16 to 1 as provided for in said bill.

"The above facts, in my opinion, also absolutely disprove any claim that the United States under the enactment of the Wheeler bill would become the dumping ground for the world's silver, or that silver, the cheapest metal, would drive out gold, the dearest metal, for the reason that neither metal would be cheaper or dearer because of the unlimited demand created for both metals by the free and unlimited coinage of both metals by the United States Mint at the fixed valuation for each metal as provided for in the Wheeler bill.

"JONATHAN BOURNE, Jr.

"WASHINGTON, D. C.,
"January 9, 1932."

By Mr. CAPPER:

A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 108) to authorize and direct the Secretary of Agriculture to investigate the cost of maintaining the present system of future trading in agricultural products and to ascertain what classes of citizens bear such cost; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE

On motion of Mr. BINGHAM, the Committee on Finance was discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. 2527) for the relief of Edwin P. Hulsberger, and it was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

EMERGENCY CREDIT EXPANSION—AMENDMENT

Mr. WALCOTT submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3616) to improve the facilities of the Federal reserve system for the service of commerce, industry, and agriculture, to provide means for meeting the needs of member banks in exceptional circumstances, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed.

AMENDMENTS TO INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. ASHURST submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 8397, the Interior Department appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed, as follows:

On page 35, line 13, after the word "deficient," insert:
"Provided further, That contracts or agreements for payment of public-school tuition from this appropriation shall provide for a rate of 75 cents a day, based upon actual attendance of each pupil covered by such contract or agreement."

Mr. ODDIE submitted amendments intended to be proposed by him to House bill 8397, the Interior Department appropriation bill, which were referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed:

On page 48, line 22, after the semicolon, insert the following: "for power lines and equipment, including payment for necessary rights of way, $17,000, to be immediately available; in all, $38,000."

On page 72, line 24, strike out "$8,000,000" and insert in lieu thereof "$15,000,000"; and

On page 73, after line 14, insert the following new paragraph:

"For payment to the city of Las Vegas, Nev., for furnishing educational facilities during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, to children of employees working on the Hoover Dam and incidental works the construction of which is authorized by the Boulder Canyon project act, $29,282.04, to be immediately available."

PRINTING OF HEARINGS ON ESTABLISHMENT OF A NATIONAL ECONOMIC COUNCIL

Mr. LA FOLLETTE submitted the following concurrent resolution (S. Con. Res. 18), which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That, in accordance with paragraph 3 of section 2 of the printing act, approved March 1, 1907, the Committee on Manufactures of the Senate be, and is hereby, empowered to have printed 3,000 additional copies of the hearings held before the committee during the current session on the establishment of a national economic council.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also announced that on to-day, February 18, 1932, the President approved and signed the following acts:

S. 1306. An act to provide for the incorporation of the District of Columbia Commission, George Washington Bicentennial; and

S. 2173. An act to authorize associations of employees in the District of Columbia to adopt a device to designate the products of the labor of their members, to punish illegal use or imitation of such device, and for other purposes.

WITHDRAWAL OF A BILL

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, on the 16th instant I introduced a bill (S. 3677) to provide for the establishment of a system of pensions for railroad and transportation employees and for a railroad pension board, and for other purposes, and it was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce. There is some controversy in reference to the terms of the bill, and the author would like to have it withdrawn until those matters can be adjusted. I therefore ask unanimous consent to withdraw the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the bill is withdrawn.

NOTICE OF MOTION TO SUSPEND PARAGRAPH 4 OF RULE XVI

Mr. HAYDEN. Mr. President, under the Rule XL, I desire to give one day's notice of a motion to suspend the rules. It is my understanding that the one day is a calendar day and not a legislative day. I send the notice to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion will be read and noted in the RECORD.

The legislative clerk read as follows:

Pursuant to the provisions of Rule XL of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby give notice in writing that I shall hereafter move to suspend paragraph 4 of Rule XVI, for the purpose of proposing to the bill (H. R. 7912) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes, the following amendment, viz: At the end of the bill insert the following:

"EMERGENCY CONSTRUCTION

"SEC. 4. That the following sums are hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be immediately available, for the purpose of providing emergency construction on public roads during the remainder of the calendar year 1932 with a view to increasing employment; namely:

"BUREAU OF PUBLIC ROADS

"Federal-aid highway system: For apportionment to and expenditure within the several States under the provisions of the Federal highway act, as amended, $120,000,000: Provided, That no part of such sum apportioned to any State need be matched by State funds and may be used to meet the provisions of such act as to State funds required on Federal-aid projects, and except that in the expenditure of such sum the limitations contained in the Federal highway act, as amended, upon construction within municipalities of 2,500 or more population and upon the payments per mile which may be made from Federal funds shall not apply.

"FOREST SERVICE

"National-forest highways: For the construction and improvement of highways within the boundaries of the national forests, $5,000,000.

"Improvement of national forest: For the construction and maintenance of roads, trails, bridges, fire lanes, etc., including the same objects specified under this head in the Agricultural appropriation act for the fiscal year 1932, $5,000,000.

"NATIONAL PARK SERVICE

"Roads and trails: For the construction, reconstruction, and improvement of roads and trails, inclusive of necessary bridges, in the national parks and national monuments under the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior, $1,500,000.

"BUREAU OF INDIAN AFFAIRS

"Indian reservation roads: For construction and improvement of Indian reservations roads under the provisions of the act approved May 26, 1928 (45 Stat. 750), $1,000,000.

"ROADS ON FEDERAL LANDS

"Roads on unappropriated or unreserved public lands, nontaxable Indian lands, etc.: For the survey, construction, reconstruction, and maintenance of main roads through unappropriated or unreserved public lands, nontaxable Indian lands, or other Federal reservations other than the forest reservations, under the provisions of the act approved June 24, 1930 (46 Stat. 805), $3,000,000."

AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATIONS

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, as an ex officio member of the Committee on Appropriations to consider the Agricultural Department appropriation bill, I report back favorably with amendments the bill (H. R. 7912) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes, and I submit a report (No. 260) thereon. I wish to express the hope that I may seize an opportunity probably to bring this bill to the attention of the Senate some time during tomorrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed on the calendar.

AMERICAN SAMOA GOVERNMENT

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I notice that on yesterday the bill (S. 417) to provide a government for American Samoa was passed. At the time I was necessarily absent from the Chamber. I wish now to enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed. I understand the papers have not gone over to the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Washington to reconsider will be entered.

PLACING OF WREATH ON GRAVE OF MOTHER OF WASHINGTON

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent for a reconsideration of House Concurrent Resolution 19, relative to the placing of a wreath on the grave of the mother of Washington.

Mr. KING. What is to be done with the concurrent resolution?

Mr. FESS. The object is to strike out the word "Clerk" and insert the word "Secretary."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves to reconsider the vote by which the concurrent resolution was agreed to. The Chair hears no objection, and the concurrent resolution is reconsidered. The Senator from Ohio now moves to amend the concurrent resolution by striking out the word "Clerk," on page 1, line 2, and inserting the word "Secretary."

Without objection, the amendment is agreed to; and, without objection, the concurrent resolution as amended is agreed to.

CLAIM OF HORACIO DE JESUS CASTILLO, A NICARAGUAN CITIZEN (H. DOC. NO. 256)

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith a report by the Secretary of State recommending the enactment of legislation authorizing an appropriation in the sum of $1,000, in settlement of the claim presented against the Government of the United States on behalf of Horacio de Jesus Castillo, a citizen of Nicaragua, as compensation for personal injuries sustained by him as the result of an assault alleged to have been committed upon him by a member of the United States Marine Corps at Matagalpa, Nicaragua, on February 24, 1931.

I recommend that the Congress enact legislation authorizing an appropriation in the amount mentioned in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of State.

HERBERT HOOVER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 18, 1932.

(Inclosure: Report from the Secretary of State.)

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

As in executive session,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate messages from the President of the United States submitting nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received, see the end of Senate proceedings.)

HOW WE TREAT THE PRESIDENTS—ADDRESS BY SENATOR JONES

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by the Senator from Washington [Mr. JONES] over the radio on Monday evening, February 15, 1932, on the subject "How We Treat the Presidents."

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Ladies and gentlemen of the radio audience, most speakers over the radio start right out on their subject. Maybe that is best—I prefer not to do it. Of course, I don't know who you are, where you are, nor how many you are. I know I have so much time, and when that is up I stop whether I am through or not. Maybe you like the way I begin, maybe not. I feel more at home with you anyhow.

I am going to talk about how we treat our Presidents and how we have done so from the beginning. I will talk no politics. What I say you may forget. It may do no good, but I ask you to think it over. If you think I am right, do your part as good citizens to see that more respect is shown our Presidents, regardless of their politics. That office is the highest in the gift of the people—it is the highest in the world. No man is, and no man in the world's history has been, the head of such a concentrated, homogeneous body of 130,000,000 energetic, intelligent, highly civilized and progressive people as is the President of the United States.

No bad man has ever been President. That I want to emphasize. Our people select him. They may differ over principles and policies, but the man they select for this high office has always been, and will continue to be, a good, patriotic man. No President has received harsher treatment at the hands of his contemporary historians than Andrew Johnson; but now that the passions engendered by his time have subsided and an impartial study of his character and his life has been possible, he is taking his just place in history as one of our really great and good Presidents.

Probably in the main we are very much like other people of our race, but we do substantially differ from them in many ways. We are more energetic, more progressive, more capable, more enlightened, and more advanced in the civilization of the day than any other people on the face of the earth. Our amazing development and record of achievement in every line of human endeavor and accomplishment justifies this opinion. We boast of our liberty and our liberal spirit, of our freedom and our independence, and yet we are the most intemperate, intolerant, and domineering in our language. This is especially true of our attitude toward those whose opinions differ from ours, and toward those in public positions when their action does not accord with our views. We have been so from the very foundation of our Government. We may not always agree with our friends or those with whom we come in daily contact, but that disagreement does not—or should not—terminate the friendship or dissolve those daily associations. There may be honest differences of opinion, but that is no valid ground for questioning the integrity, sincerity, honesty, or patriotism of those with whom we do not agree. We are too prone to do this. I protest against it. I appeal to history, to your own sense of justice, and to your patriotism, to be more just and more fair to others.

We denounce communism and anarchy, and rightly so. Yet we often unwittingly encourage and seem to justify those dangerous doctrines by the language we use toward—and the attitude we attribute to—men in high position. I have heard language in the United States Senate toward men in high office that I believe to be wholly unjustified; and if that sort of language is justified, then our Government is in danger. Fortunately, we are less intemperate along these lines than in the past and this, I think, is very encouraging. It ought to be interesting and instructive to learn how we have acted along these lines in the past and hear the length to which we have gone in expressing our difference in opinion by an attack on character. It may be encouraging to men now in high positions dealing with the most intricate and difficult problems of government, and who are earnestly striving to do the best possible for the welfare of our people, but who are severely criticized in their personal characters, their motives and their honesty impugned, to recall the facts showing that the great men in our history who, in their own day, were most severely denounced, are to-day the most idolized.

The immortal Washington lives in the hearts of our people as the Father of his Country, and the first American. Listen to what was said about him:

A newspaper owned by the grandson of Benjamin Franklin said:

"If ever a nation was debauched by a man the American Nation has been debauched by Washington. If ever a nation was deceived by a man the American Nation has been deceived by Washington."

Again he said:

"I could drop a tear over the fallen state of my country, which through the influence of one man (Washington) has been driven to the precipice of destruction. Alas that a man whose cup of glory and fame was full should suffer himself to be deluded by a false ambition, and in rebelling against his own profession, should fall, never to rise again!"

Washington was even accused by antagonistic newspapers of having overdrawn his salary at the Treasury; this charge was clearly disproved, but notwithstanding this proof one newspaper made the following editorial comment:

"General Washington went to the Treasury; some future President may go to the bank—the one step will not be one jot worse than the other."

Another paper referred to Washington as a—

"Faithless, unprincipled, and aristocratic moderatist, who would offer up the sacred obligations of our country on the altar of treachery and dishonor."

A New York paper said, upon his retirement:

"Now should the people rejoice exceedingly and let their hearts be glad, for now is the source of all misfortune brought down to the level of his fellow men. Now will political iniquity cease to be legalized by a name. * * * After bringing the country to the very brink of ruin, Washington has fled from the gathering storm. Having ran the ship between the rocks and shoals, he has abandoned the helm and left the vessel to her fate. * * * History will be puzzled to know whether Washington betrayed his character or ever had any to betray."

To sum it all up, Washington was termed "An American Cæsar—a deceiver—a debaucher of the Nation—faithless—false—unprincipled—corrupt—a traitor."

James Madison was referred to by a New York newspaper as "the little poltroon in the President's mansion."

Thomas Jefferson, not only a great President, but the patron saint of the Democratic Party, was referred to as follows:

"There is not enough spirit in a hundred such men as Mr. Jefferson to load, much less fire, one pocket pistol."

And again it was said of him:

"In the struggle between Jefferson and Burr for the Presidency, in the last resort the success of the former was only obtained by the most direct and scandalous bribery and corruption."

Andrew Jackson is classed as one of our great Presidents. According to one historian, he "was held up before the conservative and timid as rash, dangerous, destructive."

Again, it was said:

"He is a mixture of the demagogue and the despot, of depravity, desperation, malice, and vengeance partially smothered."

An orator said of him:

"The President's conduct has been lawless; he and his other Goths have set up an elective monarchy."

An attempt was made to assassinate Jackson, and one paper laid his attack to references to Jackson as "a Caesar who ought to have a Brutus, as a Cromwell, a Nero, a Tiberius."

No man is more revered to-day than Abraham Lincoln, and yet no man in our history has been more severely denounced. A New York paper said of him:

"Mr. Lincoln has proved himself a faithful tool of lawlessness. Step by step he has gone on in treason. Popular submission to his crimes but gives him, in the commission of the next, greater audacity."

Another paper said:

"The saddest day that ever dawned upon this country was that on which Abraham Lincoln was elected President; and the great mass of the people look forward with dismay to a possible repetition of that day's work."

The same paper also said of him:

"Mr. Lincoln is doomed. Nothing can save him and the country at the same time. The two can not coexist. One must be abandoned."

This statement was made on the floor of the Senate of the United States regarding Lincoln:

"Thus it has been with Mr. Lincoln—a weak and imbecile man; the weakest man I ever knew in a high place. * * * If I wanted to paint a despot, a man perfectly regardless of every constitutional right of the people, whose sworn servant, not ruler, he is, I would paint the hideous form of Abraham Lincoln."

Again was it said:

"In two years and two days more Abraham Lincoln will go out of office, and I have no doubt the whole country, except thieves, plunderers, officeholders, and the tools of power will rejoice when that day shall arrive."

Again it was said of Lincoln—and by a man of high position:

"We want to try Lincoln as Charles the First of England was tried; and if found guilty, will carry out the law."

Another said:

"You might search hell over and find none worse than Abraham Lincoln."

Another said (and all these men are from Northern States):

"The American people are ruled by felons. With all his vast armies, Lincoln has failed, failed, failed. And still the monster usurper wants more victims for his slaughter pens. I blush that such a felon should occupy the highest gift of the people. Perjury and larceny are written all over him. * * * Blood has flowed in torrents, and yet the thirst of the old monster is not quenched. His cry is ever for more blood."

Thus a man whom the country idolizes to-day as a man who sympathized with the hopes and aspirations of the lowliest of our people was called "weak—unfit—an imbecile—criminal—the tool of lawlessness—a perjured wretch—a felon—and a traitor."

To-day history points to Grover Cleveland as another of our great Presidents, and yet a great newspaper said of him:

"Mr. Cleveland has come to be an amazing incapacity, intellectually unable to comprehend the duties and responsibilities of his place."

Another great newspaper said:

"His personal character flouts morality and defies religion. It is proved by his own friends that he is a moral leper."

Another great newspaper said of him:

"He is a dull, heavy creature, a hangman, a self-confessed libertine, a political accident, a friend of monopolists and an enemy of workingmen."

To-day, as I have said, he is considered one of our great Presidents, and his administration is often referred to in most glowing terms.

Coming closer to our own immediate times, a New York paper referred to President Wilson as a "Politician who has quit principle after principle, and promise after promise, and policy after policy, with the time-serving shiftiness of a well-oiled weathercock."

Another great paper said of him:

"He has run true to form as a breaker of faith and a dodger of contracts."

And in another great publication we find:

"Talk about egomania! What is fermenting in that mind of boundless conceit, ugly arrogance and limitless ambition?"

Again it was said:

"For the gratification of his insatiable ambition and overweening egotism he would first sacrifice the vital interests and integrity of his own country, and then would menace with defeat the peace-making efforts and desires of all the world. Was there ever a more execrable exhibition of moral treason to the Nation and to humanity?"

And yet President Wilson is revered by our people to-day, regardless of politics, as one of our great Presidents and a man who devoted his life, and was willing to sacrifice it, to world peace!

The people ought to resent the aspersions hurled at the men they have entrusted with their confidence unless it is clearly proven that they purposely abused the trust reposed in them. Party fealty should not lead to groundless personal attacks. No proposition is so important as to justify unfounded innuendoes against any opponent's character.

There can be no excuse or justification for personal assaults upon the character of the President of the United States, no matter how much we may differ from him in our views. I grant you that our statesmen are partisans—they may be Republicans, Democrats, or neither; that our leading newspapers may be partisans along political, industrial, economic, or some other lines; I will further grant that our professional writers and political observers may with propriety and perfect honesty express partisan views, according to their own beliefs or those of their publishers. Granting all this, they are, or should be, patriotic Americans; and as such they must recognize that our political system is a partisan system—that there are honest differences of political thought and opinion represented chiefly by the two major political parties. It is equally true that more than one economic plan is ably and honestly urged as that which will ultimately prove to offer the greatest good to the greatest number. So any man may exercise his honest and sincere judgment in selecting a political faith or economic policy without stripping himself of his good name or destroying his own personal character. Why can it not be recognized that these differences are honest differences, that the exponents of either school of thought are equally honorable, that to differ with reference to them has no bearing on the personal attributes of a partisan on either side? To assail the personal character of a political opponent is unjustified; nay, it is worse; it is uncalled for, unpardonable, dangerous.

If our leaders with impunity and without prudence may assail the private character of one who is honestly of a different political faith or economic school, what is their responsibility if some poor, misguided, overemotional, and easily led fanatic should decide to emulate a Booth, a Guiteau, a Czolgosz? Is the character assassin who works with deliberation any less guilty than that other—it's an ugly word—murderer? I leave the answer to the good judgment of my hearers.

Harsh criticism, personal slurs, and insinuations have been hurled at President Hoover on the floor of the United States Senate, in the public press, and from the public platform. He has borne them without complaint, conscious of his own honest intentions. No President since the Civil War has been confronted during his term with more complex and difficult problems. He has faced them earnestly, uncomplainingly, and bravely, just as Lincoln faced his problems. With courage unsurpassed on the battlefield, with no regard for personal comfort and safety, he has devoted his time and strength to finding a wise solution of the problems confronting the Nation and its people. In the face of bitter and unjust criticism, despite the slurs and innuendoes against his ability and devotion to his country, regardless of the base attacks on his Americanism, he has steadfastly gone on seeking the people's welfare.

Our interest and welfare are his highest aim. He will make any personal sacrifice for the people's good. He is a partisan, as all Americans are partisans; but first he is a patriot, as all good Americans are patriots. The problems he has had to face have been the people's problems, and he has dealt with them as a patriot. His plan for their solution may or may not be in accord with that of somebody else, but the responsibility for having a plan and presenting it to Congress and to the country is his responsibility. He is not shirking that responsibility but has given, and continues to give, these problems the best and most sincere study which any man can give them—honestly and fearlessly he offers what his judgment indicates to be the best solution. Wherein does a difference of opinion on that solution constitute the right to make a personal attack on his character, ability, or patriotism? Let no man besmirch the good name of another as a political expedient. Neither party is worth it.

Just as Washington prevailed over those who called him vile names; just as Jefferson, Jackson, Lincoln, and the others whom I have named kept steadfastly on toward the right as they saw it, with the fineness of their personal characters unhurt by the slanders of their contemporary detractors, so now the President applies his energy, not to any refutation of these personal attacks but solely to the problems of state before him, problems of an enormity such as no other peace-time President has had to face. Let us be thankful that neither the slanderer nor the detractor has undermined his faith in America and Americans, nor deviated him from the path of duty as he sees it in the light of his own experience and the counsel of his advisers. And in spite of the attacks—in spite of the stupendous problems before him—his personality remains the same. He has not forgotten his own boyhood struggles with poverty, and is ready and glad to give a helping hand to every poor struggling boy. He has the tenderness of a woman and the modesty of a child. He does not ask men's applause but seeks their good at any personal sacrifice to himself.

When our people return again to a high plane of prosperity, as they will; when the future historians write of these troublous times and the unselfish leadership of those who conducted us through them; when his calumiators and detractors are forgotton, Herbert Hoover will have his place among the wisest, ablest, most courageous, and patriotic of our Presidents.

RADIO BROADCASTING IN EUROPE

Mr. DILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article by Armstrong Perry entitled "Radiobroadcasting in Europe." This article was prepared for publication by the National Committee on Education by Radio of the Interior Department.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

RADIOBROADCASTING IN EUROPE—HOW IT IS CONTROLLED AND FINANCED

The National Committee on Education by Radio sent Armstrong Perry, director of its service bureau, to Europe in August, 1931. He was instructed to obtain from officials of each country information concerning radiobroadcasting.

The United States Department of State gave Mr. Perry a letter of introduction addressed to the diplomatic and consular officers of the United States of America. The United States Commissioner of Education gave him a letter of introduction addressed to educational officials in Europe. In each of the 35 countries visited, Mr. Perry called first at the American consulate, unless the consulate had previously made arrangements which rendered a call unnecessary. The consulates arranged for his interviews with radio officials and officials of public education. Usually a member of the staff of the consulate accompanied him and was present during the interviews.

Mr. Perry prepared a report concerning each country and submitted these reports to the consulates which had arranged for his interviews. At his request the consulates submitted the reports to the persons interviewed except in one case in which the consulate suggested that the reports be sent directly to the persons interviewed. Such changes as were suggested by the consulates or by persons interviewed were made.

The report of Mr. Perry's investigation follows:

In a nutshell

Number of countries having stations	29
Number of countries having no stations	7
Number in which the governments own and operate all stations and provide programs	7
Number in which the governments own and operate some of the stations and provide programs on these	2
Number in which governments own and operate stations but have programs provided by program companies	3
Number in which governments own the stations and grant operating concessions to private companies	1
Number in which governments grant concessions to companies which build and operate stations and provide programs	17
Number in which governments own stock in operating or program companies	4
Number in which broadcasting is supported entirely by license fees from listeners	10
Number in which voluntary contributions are the only source of revenue	2
Number in which government appropriations are the only source of revenue	2
Number in which advertising is the only source of revenue [1]	1
Number in which license fees and other taxes support broadcasting	1
Number in which license fees and voluntary contributions support broadcasting	1
Number in which license fees and advertising support broadcasting [2]	7
Number in which license fees, other taxes, and advertising support broadcasting [2]	4
Number in which license fees, voluntary contributions, and advertising support broadcasting	1

An important source of revenue in some countries is the sale of program magazines.

Albania: No broadcasting station in operation.

Andorra: No broadcasting station in operation.

Austria: Broadcasting stations are operated by Ravag, a corporation, under a 30-year contract with the Government. A license fee of 2 schillings (about 30 cents) per month is charged for each radio receiver. Number of receivers paying fee in 1930, 423,534. Government retained 10 per cent of license fees (about $152,472.24) plus 12 per cent dividends on capital stock of Ravag, of which a large part is owned by the Government, plus 50 per cent of that portion of the net profits which remains after payment of 8 per cent dividend. Ravag received 90 per cent of the license fees, about $1,372,250.16. No advertising broadcast. Licensed sets increased 12 per cent in 1930. Further increase of 15,788 receivers (3.77 per cent) reported January 1 to July 1, 1931.

[1] Luxemburg. The station is expected to open April 1, 1932.

[2] The amount of revenue from advertising is negligible.

Belgium: New law in effect June, 1930, created the Belgian National Institute of Broadcasting, composed of one representative of the Government and nine representatives of civic, education, and religious organizations, so chosen as to insure unofficial representation of all political parties. The institute began broadcasting in February, 1931. Set owners pay license fee of 60 francs (about $2.40) yearly. Number of licensed sets in 1930, 81,150.

Government retained 10 per cent of license fees, 486,900 francs (about $13,633.20). Institute received 90 per cent (about $122,698.80), plus the proceeds of a 6 per cent tax on all imported vacuum tubes. Advertising is prohibited. The two major stations are operated by the institute. One college station and 10 small local stations are operated by their respective managements, but are not permitted to sell time for advertising. Licensed sets reported in July, 1931, 69,437.

Bulgaria: Only broadcasting station is operated by Rodno Radio, a private organization of listeners, under temporary permission from Government. There are about 6,000 members. Each pays 500 levras (about $3.58) per year. Programs controlled by a commission of educators appointed by the Government. Government collects a license fee of 500 levras from each set owner (3,024 in 1930) and retains all of it. Revenue from this source about $10,825.92.

Czechoslovakia: Broadcasting stations owned by the Government. Operated by Radio Journal, a corporation in which the Government owns 51 per cent of the capital stock. Radio Journal has no contract with the Government and no assurance of continuation of privileges. The Government pays some of the operating engineers. Radio Journal pays the research engineers. Government collects license fee of 120 crowns (about $3.60) annually on receiving sets. Licensed sets in 1930, 315,241. Total license fees about $1,134,867.60. Government retained 50 per cent (about $567,433.80).

Radio Journal received the same amount. Sets reported as 325,000 in July, 1931. Advertising prohibited as "impossible and undesirable." American radio receivers and others imported into the country are subject to royalties, which must be paid to the Telefunken Co.

Danzig: Only broadcasting station is owned and operated by the Government. A license fee of 2½ gulden (about 50 cents) monthly is collected from each of 20,000 set owners. Total revenue, $120,000 per year. Balance after paying expenses, 10 per cent (about $12,000). Total time used for advertising, about five minutes daily. The listeners complain about this and it is believed that no more would be tolerated. Number of receiving sets reported as 16,000, July, 1931. The Danzig station has connection with all German stations and those of central Europe through the Konigsberg station.

Denmark: Government owns and operates stations. Advertising prohibited. News broadcasting handled by Pressens Radio, an organization representing the newspapers and financed by the Government. In 1922 listeners sent in voluntary contributions amounting to $15,000 to finance programs. Government operation started 1925. Number of licensed sets in 1930, 420,000; 1931, 450,000 (13 per cent of the population, highest percentage in Europe). Set owners pay 10 kronen (about $2.67) yearly. Income from this source, about $1,000,000 yearly. Operating expense is from about $667,500 to about $801,000 yearly. Law prohibits use of license fees for purposes other than broadcasting, so balance is used for improvement of plant and programs.

Estonia: Broadcasting station operated by Raadio Ringhaaling Co. under permission from the Government. Government collects license fees for receivers, $4 to $10 per year. Number of receivers April 1, 1931, 13,266. Income above $60,000 per year. Government retains 15 per cent (more than $9,000). The balance (over $51,000) goes to Raadio Ringhaaling Co., but Government taxes reduce this to $30,600 up to $35,700. The company paid a dividend to stockholders in 1928 and since that time has added 10 to 12 per cent of its gross income to its reserve. Number of receivers reported in July, 1931, 15,869. Advertising occupies about 20 minutes per day. The income from advertising is too small to affect the policies of the company.

Finland: Government owns and operates all but two stations and will take over these two. Programs are produced by Osakeyhtio Suomen Yleisradio, a national organization whose capital stock is owned by universities and other educational and civic organizations, including cooperative societies (which include in their membership about 35 per cent of the population). The managing board of the company is composed of 4 representatives of the Government and 15 representatives of the stockholders. The executive committee of the board is composed of 5 members elected by the board. Said committee, representing the 63 educational and civic shareholding groups, and enlarged by 2 members representing the Government, forms together the program committee, which partly arranges, but mainly only controls, the details of current programs. These contain no advertising. The Government taxes receivers 100 marks (about $2.50) yearly. There were 106,559 licensed receivers in 1930 and the income was about $266,397.50. The Government retained about 50 per cent to pay operating expenses and paid the balance to the program organization. This organization pays 7 per cent dividends, which are limited to 1 per cent above the discount rate of the state bank. There is a possibility that the Government will take over the program organization. Political propaganda is excluded. Also care is taken to prevent any political party from gaining a preponderance of power in the board.

France: The Government operates some stations and others are operated by commercial companies. Advertising is limited to short announcements because the listeners do not want advertising. The Government charges a license fee of 10 francs (about 39 cents) yearly for receivers. The number of receivers is reported by a commercial broadcasting company as 2,000,000, but this appears to be an estimate.

Germany: The German Reichspost (mail service) is the central office for all legally sanctioned activities in the field of radio. The Government controls Reichs Rundfunk Gesellschaft, which is a central organization representing nine broadcasting companies. The Reichs Rundfunk Gesellschaft has a majority vote in the nine companies. Another organization, Deutsche Welle, receiving income from the operating companies, provides national educational programs. A license fee of 24 marks (about $5.63) yearly is collected from owners of receivers. Number of receivers in 1930, 3,509,509. Revenue from fees, about $19,758,535.67. The Government retained 40 per cent (about $7,903,414.26) and paid 60 per cent (about $11,855,121.40) to the operating companies. The companies are permitted to make profits up to 10 per cent. Number of receivers reported July, 1931, 3,241,725. Advertising is broadcast about 10 minutes daily from each station. Revenue from advertising goes to the Government. Listeners object to the advertising, and an effort is being made to reduce the time.

Great Britain: Stations operated by British Broadcasting Corporation, which is chartered by the Government. This corporation succeeded the British Broadcasting Company, dissolved because it was under control of the radio industry. Because of this control it came to be felt there was no guaranty against exploitation of listeners. The Postmaster General is the agent of liaison between the corporation, the Crown, and Parliament. He has the right to issue licenses for the construction and operation of broadcasting stations, to issue such general orders and particular instructions as he considers useful, to demand such proof as he desires of the execution of his instructions, to examine the accounts and annual reports of the corporation, and to authorize or forbid the liquidation of the corporation.

The mention of the producers of a phonograph record that is broadcast, or of a sponsor of a program, is permitted, but nothing else in the nature of advertising.

The Government charges a license fee of 10 shillings (about $2.43) yearly for receivers. The number of receivers (1931) was nearly 4,000,000. The income from license fees was well over $7,000,000. The Government retained 12½ per cent of this amount (about $875,000). The national treasury department took approximately 25 per cent (about $1,750,000). Total revenue for the Government, about $2,625,000. To help the Government in the financial depression of 1931 the corporation voluntarily offered to pay $1,000,000 into the treasury out of the balance put aside for future development.

Greece: No broadcasting station at present. A concession has been granted to Durham & Co. (Inc.), of Philadelphia, Pa. The Government retains full control of its radio channels. A license fee will be collected from set owners by the Government, which will give the company money to finance its operations in Greece. Brief advertising announcements will be permitted between programs. Number of receivers at present about 3,000.

Hungary: The Government erects, operates, and maintains the broadcasting stations. The programs are provided by Magyar Telefonhirmondo es Radio, a corporation. A tax of 2.40 pengos (about 40 cents) per month is collected from owners of radio receivers. Additional amounts are collected from hotels and other concerns using one master receiver to serve numbers of patrons. The Government retains one-half the tax and gives the balance to the program company. There were 307,909 licensed receivers in 1930. Revenue to the Government about $1,477,963.20. Same amount to the program company. The company's share will be reduced and that of the Government correspondingly increased if the number of set owners increases beyond a certain stipulated total. Advertising by radio is prohibited as contrary to the best interests of the Government, the company, and the listeners. Program plans are submitted in advance for the approval of the Government, and certain hours are reserved for use by the Government. Hungary began broadcasting music and news over telephone lines to homes in 1896, and is believed to have had a longer experience with program service than any other country.

Irish Free State: The Government owns and operates the broadcasting stations. They are financed by a license fee of 10 shillings per year (about $1.70) plus an ad valorem duty of about 33⅓ per cent on imported radio apparatus. Number of licensed sets (1930), 26,000. Revenue to the Government, about $44,200. Advertising time is sold to reputable concerns selling Irish products or foreign products not competing with Irish products, but the demand for time is small.

Italy: The broadcasting stations are erected and operated by Ente Italiano per le Audizione Radiofoniche. Program plans are submitted in advance to a commission appointed by the Government. The commission comprises representatives of the musical, scientific, artistic, and civic interests of the nation.

The Government collects annual license fees of 72 lire (about $3.60) yearly on radio receivers. Number of receivers (1930), 170,000. Income from this source, about $612,000. The Government also collects duties on imported radio receivers and compulsory contributions from all town and city governments in place of more than 1,000 population and from hotels and other places of public entertainment. Advertising announcements are permitted during the daytime but not in the evening. The demand for advertising time is small, because listeners object to advertising. The Government retains about 4 per cent of the license fees and 10 per cent of the contributions. Profits of Ente Italiano per le Audizione Radiofoniche are not limited by law, but the demands of the Government for the development of facilities and programs tend to limit the profits.

Latvia: The Government owns and operates the only broadcasting station. A license fee of 2 lats (about 40 cents) per month is collected from owners of radio receivers during the winter and 1 lat (about 20 cents) per month in the summer. Number of receivers (1930), 38,740. Revenue to the Government, about $162,708.

The League of Nations: The League of Nations has made a contract with Radio Suisse, a communications company, for the use of a short-wave station at Geneva, Switzerland. Addresses and news of the league will be broadcast to all parts of the world, by radiotelegraphy at first, but later, possibly, by radiotelephony. The broadcasting will be financed at first by handling commercial point-to-point communications.

Liechtenstein: No broadcasting station. The Government has a contract with the Government of Switzerland under which the radio laws of Switzerland, among others, apply to Liechtenstein. Owners of radio receivers pay a license fee of 15 francs yearly (about $2.92) to Switzerland.

Lithuania: The Government owns and operates the only broadcasting station. The broadcasting of programs is under the supervision of the Ministry of Education. Owners of crystal radio receivers pay two lits (about 20 cents) per month if they live in cities and one lit (about 10 cents) per month if they live in rural areas. Owners of tube receivers pay license fees of five lits (about 50 cents) per month if they live in cities and three lits (about 30 cents) per month if they live in rural areas. Revenue to the Government in 1930, about $32,860. Of this 90 per cent went to the Ministry of Education and covered between 60 per cent and 65 per cent of the broadcasting expense. The balance was paid by the Government. Advertising is broadcast from 2 to 5 minutes 2 or 3 days a week. Advertisers pay 15 lits (about $1.50) per minute. Income from advertising about $600.

Luxemburg: The Government has given a concession to Compagnie Luxembourgeoise de Hadiodiffusion, a commercial company which is erecting a 200,000-watt broadcasting station. It will derive its revenue from advertising. An official of the company stated that it was associated with an international trust which includes in its membership the dominant American and European radio corporations. He stated also that when the powerful station of his company began broadcasting it would be difficult for many weaker stations in other countries to continue. The contract calls for the appointment by the Government of two commissions to control the operations and programs of the company. Of the net profits, 5 per cent will be set aside for the obligatory legal reserve; then 6 per cent of the balance for dividends to stockholders; then 15 per cent of the balance may be taken for gratuities for the board of directors. The Government will receive 30 per cent of what remains of the net profits.

Monaco: No broadcasting station. A small license fee is collected from owners of radio receivers, but they are few in number and the income is inconsiderable.

The Netherlands: The two stations, by consent of the Government, are operated by two broadcasting organizations, which represent civic, educational, and religious interests. Two other major and seven minor organizations are given time on these stations. Advertising has been prohibited by law since 1928, although it paid 70 per cent net profit to the broadcasting organizations until it was prohibited. No license fees are collected from owners of radio receivers. Broadcasting is dependent entirely on voluntary contributions from listeners. Listeners increased rapidly after advertising was prohibited. One organization with 132,000 regular contributors accumulated a surplus of $600,000 in two years. Another has 125,000 regular volunteer contributors who send in an average of 4 florins (about $1.60) yearly and has accumulated a large surplus. The four major organizations received contributions amounting to about $800,000 in 1931, according to a reliable estimate.

Norway: Broadcasting is mainly in the hands of one private company, Kringkastingsalskapet, A. S. The Government collects license fees of 20 krone (about $5.34) yearly from owners of receivers and retains 25 per cent. Also a sales tax of 10 per cent on the retail prices of receivers is collected. The broadcasting companies receive 75 per cent of the license fees and all of the tax. The total amount is divided among the companies according to the number of licensed receivers in their respective territories. Out of this income the salaries of the Government employees who have charge of the technical operation of the station, are paid, as are all other broadcasting expenses. Number of receiving sets (September, 1931) about 100,000. Income from license fees, about $534,000. The profits of the company are limited by law to 7 per cent. On account of technical difficulties which prevent complete coverage of the mountainous country, the number of set owners is not sufficient to provide that percentage of profit at present. The Oslo Broadcasting Co., whose total income for 1930 was about $516,360, received $18,760 from advertising, which is confined to a short period at about 7 p. m. and not connected with other programs. Because of complaints from listeners the limitation on advertising is expected to continue.

Poland: The Government owns 40 per cent of the stock of the operating company, Polskie Radjo, S. A. This stock is in a class by itself, the other classes of stock being preferred and common. No stock can be sold or transferred without the consent of the board of directors. A monthly license fee of 3 zlotys (about 35 cents) is collected from owners of radio receivers. The Government retains 15 per cent, and Polskie Radjo receives 85 per cent, under a 20-year contract. Number of receivers (1930) 246,000. Income from license fees, about $1,033,200. Each of the six stations in Poland sells 20 minutes a day to advertisers, but the revenue from this source is too small to affect the general policies of the company. There was no intention (August, 1931) of increasing advertising time. Polskie Radjo pays 15 per cent dividends on preferred stock and 10 per cent on common. An advisory committee to develop programs consists of five representatives of the Government and four of the company.

Portugal: Provisional licenses for the erection and operation of broadcasting stations are issued to reputable persons or concerns. The broadcasting of advertising is prohibited. No license fees are collected from owners of receivers. Stations are operated mainly by radio dealers and experimenters. The Government has appropriated $200,000 for a Government broadcasting station of 20 kilowatts or more.

Rumania: Broadcasting is done by the Société de Diffusion Radiotéléphonique de Roumanie. This is a joint stock company with $300,000 capital. Sixty per cent of the stock belongs to the Government and 40 per cent to banks, which subscribed $12,000 when the company was organized. An annual license fee of about $4.80 is collected on tube sets and about $1.40 on crystal sets. There were 51,199 licensed sets in 1930. The number in November, 1931, was estimated at 75,000. Radio shops pay a tax of $6 yearly; clubs, $12; motion-picture theaters, $18; public establishments, $30. Broadcasting was subsidized by the Government to the amount of $30,000 in 1929, but in 1930 the stock of the broadcasting company paid a 10 per cent dividend. The erection of two regional stations depends on the attitude of the American company which has the telephone monopoly in Rumania.

Russia: Broadcasting is operated as an instrument of special utility in fixing the attention of the masses on the fundamental questions of the socialist construction, in industry as well as in the socialistic sector of rural economy. The Commissariat of Posts and Telegraphs was charged to furnish all the republics, countries, and regions in the Soviet Union, and also the principal autonomous republics and regions, with broadcasting stations during 1931 and 1932. The Supreme Council of the National Economy was charged to erect, in 1932, three stations of 100 kilowatts power and eight stations of 10 kilowatts. The Commissariat of Posts and Telegraphs was charged to construct six stations of 10 kilowatts, and to begin, in 1932, a Radio House (headquarters) to be finished in 1933. In 1932 a factory is to be built for the production of radio receivers at the annual rate of 1,000,000. Factories for the production of tubes and other accessories are also provided for. Loud-speakers are to be produced at the annual rate of 4,000,000 in a factory to be finished in 1932. Programs will be transmitted by wire lines and radio to all parts of the country, and reception will be assured by the production of receivers to meet the conditions in lumber camps, mines, hunters' cabins, fishing boats, farming districts, villages, towns, and cities, and on the highways. All suitable wave lengths will be organized and employed. Russia already has many broadcasting stations. Programs are broadcast in many languages, and are heard throughout Europe and on other continents.

The Saar: No broadcasting stations or plans.

San Marino: No broadcasting station, few receivers, no radio laws, and no license fees. Programs from all parts of Europe are heard.

Spain: The privilege of erecting and operating broadcasting stations is granted free of charge to acceptable persons and organizations. A license fee of 5 pesetas (about 50 cents) yearly is collected from owners of radio receivers. The Government retains all of this, and gives general supervision to the programs to see that information and education are given a proper proportion of the time and that no laws are violated. The only company operating on a large national scale is Union-Radio, which owns and operates six stations and operates a seventh station which is rented from the Government for certain hours. Advertising is permitted. Listeners are invited to contribute toward the expense of programs. About 15,000 listeners in Madrid give from 10 cents to 50 cents monthly. The Government may take over all broadcasting or place a monopoly in the hands of a radio organization.

Sweden: The Government owns and operates the major stations. Only a few low-power local stations are in private hands. A license fee of 10 krona (about $2.70) yearly is collected from owners of radio receivers. Number of receivers (1930), 482,300. Revenue from licenses, about $1,302,210. The production of programs is placed in the hands of a private company, Aktiobolaget Radiojanst. This company receives one-third of the license fees, and is permitted to take from this a profit of 6 per cent. Any balance remaining after program expense and profits are paid is used for improvement of plant and programs, or returned to the Government. The private local stations receive a percentage of the license fees collected in their respective areas and are permitted to broadcast the national programs. Representatives appointed by the Government in the Ministries of Education and Commerce serve as advisers to the broadcasting companies with a view to maintaining satisfactory standards for programs. Advertising and political propaganda are excluded from radio programs.

Switzerland: The Government reorganized its broadcasting system in 1931. The private companies which had operated the seven broadcasting stations in the country were brought into one national organization, called the Swiss Radio Corporation. The number of transmitting stations was reduced to two, which were connected with all the local broadcasting studios. A third station will be erected. Advertising is prohibited.

The Swiss Radio Corporation is not a business concern but a program organization. The Swiss Government has five representatives in the corporation. Each of the local program organizations is represented. A license fee of 15 francs (about $3) yearly is collected from owners of radio receivers. Number of licensed receivers (October, 1931), 127,000, an increase of over 25 per cent from the preceding January. Revenue from this source, about $381,000. The Swiss Radio Corporation receives 80 per cent of the license fees. The Government retains the balance. Three private companies have been granted concessions from the Government for distributing radio programs over private-wire circuits to listeners.

Turkey: The two broadcasting stations in Turkey are operated by Telsiz Telefon T. A. S., a corporation which has a concession from the Government extending to 1937. Radio is used only to a negligible extent for advertising. The Government collects $2 per kilogram on imported radio apparatus plus 10 per cent ad valorem, plus 25 per cent ad valorem. The latter percentage goes to the broadcasting company. Users of radio receivers pay an annual license fee of about $1.50. The number of licensed receivers (October, 1931) was about 2,500. The broadcasting company is capitalized at about $50,000. Much of the stock is in control of a bank in which the Government has an active interest. The company's office is in the post office at Istanbul and its relations with the Government are close. Broadcast advertising occupies only a negligible part of the time.

Vatican City: The Government has a short-wave radio station, which includes apparatus for the transmission of still pictures. The station is used mainly for point-to-point radiotelegraphic communications of the church, but programs are broadcast twice daily on week days and once on Sundays. Efforts to induce the Pope to authorize a regular program service, relayed to America through American chains, have failed. Broadcasting of advertising is not permitted.

Yugoslavia: The Government has given concessions to two broadcasting companies and one society. Each operates one station and serves principally one section of the country. The law permits the Government to control the programs and to take over the stations at any time. A license fee of 25 dinars (about 50 cents) monthly is collected from owners of radio receivers. Number of receivers (1931), 42,478. Revenue from licenses, about $254,868. Each of the three broadcasting organizations receives from 65 per cent to 85 per cent of the license fees collected in its service area. The balance is retained by the Government. Advertising is permitted, but the listeners object to it so much that it is limited to a few brief announcements. The leading company is considering eliminating all advertising. The Government permits the broadcasting organizations to make profits up to 20 per cent. Anything over that is to go to the Government. No profits were made up to 1931, but the increase of receiving sets indicates that there may be profits later.

USE AND ISSUANCE OF MONEY—ARTICLE BY M. F. PEARSON

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have here an article by Mowbray French Pearson, of Spokane, Wash., touching the subject of the use and issuance of money for public works, which I ask unanimous consent may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MONEY

By Mowbray French Pearson

President Hoover recently delivered a message to Congress urging reduced expenditures. We have to relieve unemployment and distress. There may be some question about appropriations for public work. This paper is written particularly to show a method of issuing money in payment for public work. We have been helping the farmers through the Farm Board. Another way of doing so is shown. There has long been a desire to stabilize the dollar. A method of doing that is shown. Congress is faced with the reparations problem. My impression is this country refuses to allow goods to come in because that may take business away from our own people. We insist on gold payment. If the plan given in Men or Money were put into effect we could take goods from Europe and our own people would still have plenty to do. I will show a new basis for issuing money different and better than any now in use.

The question of money has come down to us from antiquity. The more complex civilization becomes, the more acute becomes the problem. At least four world conferences have been held to improve money without result. At present we have in the United States the following kinds of money:

1. Coin, actual value equal to face value.
2. Paper currency convertible into metal.
3. Paper currency convertible into other money.
4. Coins the face value of which is greater than metallic value but receivable at face value.
5. Paper money and bank notes secured by partial reserves and right of convertibility.
6. Token coins.
7. Paper money, not convertible, but value depends upon the relation of quantity to demand.

We are just passing through a world-wide depression and it is imperative that some solution be found to relieve this condition, and if possible prevent its recurrence.

This paper will show that all wealth (money) is the result of time-energy and that therefore money should be issued on a basis of time-energy.

What is money? Webster's New International Dictionary edition of 1928 gives this definition. "Metal, as gold, silver, copper and issued by a recognized authority as a medium of exchange—and paper currency—in a comprehensive sense anything used as a medium of exchange, sheep, wampum, gold dust, shovel blades, tobacco." I will now give what I think should be the definition of money. "Gold, silver, or other metal coined, or paper money issued, by a recognized authority, as a token to represent time-energy. The article produced by time-energy must be in the possession or under the control of the authority and the money issued must be called in when the article passes from said control, except gold or other metal which is itself the product of time-energy." The security must be of good value.

In the earliest historic times trading was by barter but gold and silver were among the most desired articles. They were found to have the most stable value in all countries and were the easiest transported so finally became the commonest medium of exchange. The present use of gold is therefore because of antiquity and the fact that it had value without the stamp of recognized authority.

It has not an absolute value. True, $1 always contains 25.8 grains of gold 9-10th fine but its cost of production is not uniform. On the Nome beach a man with a rocker, shovel, and gold pan could secure $100 a day or more by his individual effort. A prospector might look for gold a year and not earn his grubstake. Neither has gold (or silver) an absolute buying power. The amount one can buy with a dollar varies tremendously, so although wages may remain the same in dollars they actually may be half or double.

The United States is on a gold basis so let us consider gold as money. Where does gold come from? It is the time-energy of a miner. That is the original source of gold. Sheep are money. Where do they come from? Time-energy of a farmer. He spent his time and work looking after them and raising their feed. Every article of wealth has its original basis in time-energy. Gold is time-energy, wheat is time-energy, sheep are time-energy. If the same amount of effort is put into each they would be worth the same amount. Gold is a commodity the same as sheep or wheat. It can be put in the cash drawer; they can not. The original source of each is time-energy, so let a recognized authority issue a token for time-energy and see that back of that token is a product of value.

Congress should pass a law establishing the amount of time-energy equal to a gold dollar. It should then issue paper money on the same basis of time-energy, and the paper dollar would be worth the same as the gold dollar. It would have the same original value back of it.

Miner plus time-energy produces gold. Government issues gold certificate.	Farmer plus time-energy produces wheat. Government issued time-energy certificate.

They are both equal to the same thing, so equal to each other.

Some may immediately say this is flat money, but such is not the case. Fiat money is issued with no value back of it, but this money has value back of it.

Since I have shown that time-energy is the basis of value, men can be employed on public work that has a permanent value and be paid in money. Take the proposed dam across the Columbia River which is to water the Columbia Basin project and furnish power for the Northwest. It will have a permanent value. Instead of issuing bonds for its construction, issue money for its construction. Retire, say, 1 per cent or 2 per cent a year for depreciation, and if the money is wisely spent there is a better value back of the money than there would be if the same value in gold were lying uselessly in the vaults at Washington. The dam would be of use to the people; the gold is of no use.

Public roads, aviation fields, public buildings—anything of a permanent nature belonging to the public—could be paid for in money, with enough money redeemed each year to take care of the depreciation.

That would mean financing public work during any depression without bonds or increased taxation, and it would be done on a sound basis.

Money could also be issued against wheat. Wheat is the product of time-energy. As long as it is in the possession of the farmer, he owns the wealth. If he puts it into a public bonded warehouse, the Government could issue time-energy money against his warehouse receipt up to a reasonable per cent of its value. If the price went down, the farmer would have to turn back part of his money to maintain his margin or have his wheat sold at the market. If the price went up and he wanted to sell, the miller would give him gold certificates for the whole value of his wheat. The farmer would give the miller the time-energy money and his warehouse receipt which the miller would give to the Government and take his wheat. The time-energy money would be canceled as there would be no value back of it. The above is merely to show the theory. In practice the money would be interchangeable and it would just be necessary to have value to the amount of the time-energy money outstanding. The public would think no more about time-energy money than it does now about whether it gets gold, a gold certificate, greenbacks, or banknotes.

There would be no need of a Farm Board to finance the farmers. They could finance themselves and the system would work automatically. If a farmer wanted money on his growing crop or for harvesting, he would go to his bank the same as now. Currency would be expanded and contracted with the needs of trade with this addition. Money would be issued for public work during times of depression so there would be expansion of the currency during hard times instead of contraction as at present; the currency would, however, have value back of it. Our stock of gold is an accumulation of hundreds of years. It is the result of time-energy saved. It can not be eaten, it can not be burned, it can not be used for either clothes or houses. It is merely money. Time-energy money would gradually accumulate representing the increased wealth of the Nation in public works of all kinds. There would be more of it the same as the stock of gold increases with each additional supply mined.

There has long been a desire to have a gold dollar worth a definite amount. To-day the only thing stable about it is that it contains 25.8 grains of gold. Its cost of production is wildly erratic, its buying power as bad. Gold is hard to stabilize, but time energy is a fairly definite thing. One man may do twice as much work as another, but the average amount of work a million men can do is about the same this year and next year. If improved machinery increases production, the increase will be gradual and permanent. Gold will then be a token representing a fairly certain quantity—time, energy. Gold can still be used the same as now, especially in international transactions, until such time as the League of Nations issues time-energy money. None of our present money need be changed in the least. There would be just eight kinds of money instead of seven.

Prices would still fluctuate if the quantities of goods produced were more or less than demand, but if production were regulated as suggested in Men or Money, the price of commodities would gradually become worth just their cost in time-energy, and prices would be uniform.

International reparations are causing serious concern. The United States does not want to cancel billions of dollars due and does not know how to collect. Under present conditions, if payment is taken in goods, additional unemployment is created in this country. But suppose everyone is busy, as may easily be the case if suggestions in Men or Money are followed. The United States can say to Germany, "We will ship what you need in raw materials if you will return manufactured goods to 10 per cent greater value in time-energy." The United States would know what its people want from budgets submitted. These goods could be sold to the public and the money used to retire Liberty bonds. Everybody in this country would be busy, anyway, so this would be real wealth coming into this country to pay for what we sent to Europe during the war. Europe would be busy, and soon conditions all over the world would improve.

In issuing money against a man's time-energy the man becomes the important thing and the money the result of his labors as was outlined in Men or Money.

An increase of the quantity of money raises prices and a diminution lowers them. Let me quote from House Miscellaneous Documents, first session, Forty-ninth Congress, 1885–86, volume 25, page 10: "A rise in the value of money and a fall in general prices are the greatest evils which can befall the world. In the whole history of the human race not a single instance can be pointed out of a fall in the value of either or both of the metals which has not proved a benefaction to mankind, while on the other hand, during every period and whenever a rise in the value of metallic money has occurred it has been attended by financial, industrial, political, and social disaster."

Time-energy is universal, it starts over again every morning. The supply can not be cornered by any bank, group of banks, country, or group of countries. If that is used in a sound manner as the basis for money there will never be another financial stringency. Every producer will make his own money the same as he did at the beginning of time. The Government will merely issue its token so there can be universal transfer.

Taking my booklet, Men or Money, and this article together, I have shown how we can have a national plan of production and distribution; how everyone can have what he wants up to the maximum of his earning power, without regard to possible unemployment; have immense public works done by men who are now idle, and at no cost; have shown how crime can be lessened; how manufacturers can be benefited; how farmers can be helped; have shown a new basis of issuing currency that is absolutely sound, is elastic, will expand during times of depression; and how the dollar will have a much more uniform value than ever in the past.

The labor of about 10,000,000 people is being wasted in the United States alone because of the lack of a national plan of production and distribution. This stupendous waste is entirely avoidable. It just takes the vote of Congress to start the wheels of industry moving. It is not only the privilege but it is the duty of every citizen to urge action to stop this tremendous waste of wealth and to stop the uncalculable misery due to this depression.

There have been rumors that this is a made panic or at least that its severity and length have been much increased by artificial means to enable the rich to depress prices and so get hold of the world's securities, which are the evidences of its wealth. It is suggested that many men in public life and many editors are opposed to even a discussion of a reasonable method of improving conditions. They want things as they are until they have finished gathering in the harvest.

Where do you stand? Have you helped to create this depression? Do you want its continuance? Do you put personal profit before the welfare of millions of people? Will you play politics regardless of consequences to the people of this Nation and of the world? Are you afraid to express your opinion? Surely you have an opinion. Silence is a cowardly way of standing pat.

If you are a voter, you can write to your Senator or Congressman, urging action along the lines suggested; if you are a newspaperman or man of influence, you can use your pen or voice; if you are a Senator or Congressman, you can speak and vote to secure results. The answer is up to you.

RELIEF OF UNEMPLOYMENT—ARTICLE BY J. B. FITZGERALD

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I present an article entitled "A Work Army Plan to Relieve Unemployment," by Mr. J. B. Fitzgerald, of Seattle, Wash., in charge of the information department of the West Coast Lumbermen's Association, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A WORK-ARMY PLAN TO RELIEVE UNEMPLOYMENT

I should like to recommend that the President's Organization on Unemployment Relief give consideration to the suggestions outlined below:

1. That beginning at the earliest possible date this fall, by October 15, or November 1, at the latest, the United States Government set up a plan for enlisting men in the United States Army for a three months' or a four months' period, the enlistment to be national in scope and, in so far as it can be so arranged, organized to withdraw from the local population numbers of the unemployed such as would best serve the necessities in villages, towns, and cities.

2. As this temporary enlistment would be for the purposes of forwarding unemployment relief and preventing the serious consequences we may all foresee in another winter of widespread hunger and idleness, this recommendation includes a temporary abandonment of the usual strict physical examination on enlistments under this proposed special short-term arrangement. It should be the intention to relieve unemployment first and to do this all men capable of doing ordinary physical labor in industries might well be accepted.

3. The bulk of the recruits accepted under this temporary enlistment plan might be taken under Regular Army direction into the Corps of Engineers, and, after being given sufficient military training for purposes of discipline, be employed on public works or otherwise during the winter under Army direction, but on projects developed to assist the States, counties, and cities in the area. Others, better suited for military service, might be sent directly to the established Army camps and be given three or four months of regular military training. Both groups, however, should be treated alike as temporary members of the armed forces of the United States.

4. Officers of the National Guard and of the reserve forces, who totaled in 1929, 12,535 and 101,926, respectively, might be used to handle under Army authority the entire enlistment to do most of the management of the unemployment troops during the short enlistment.

5. The initial enlistment should call for 1,000,000 men.

6. Cost: The pay of a man under this enlistment might be placed at $1 per day. Subsistence of the Army in 1929 cost $24,000,000 with an enlisted personnel of 124,000, or approximately 53 cents per man per day. Clothing and equipage during 1929 cost the Army $6,650,000, or 15 cents per man per day. This is the equivalent of $13.89 per man for three months. Subsistence at 53 cents per day for 90 days equals $46.80. Subsistence and clothing on the 1929 basis would total approximately $60; but due to the present low cost of materials, these figures might easily be reduced by 25 per cent. A 25 per cent reduction would leave the estimated cost of subsistence and clothing per man for a 90-day period at $44. Add to this $90 for pay and $10 per man for average transportation and the total is $144 per man for a 90-day enlistment, or $144,000,000 per 1,000,000 men.

I have been informed that the Army has complete equipment now to care for an enlistment in the regular way of 1,000,000 men, so that up to this number the above estimates of cost may be excessive.

7. The cost of caring for 1,000,000 men might be met through arrangement with the States, counties, and cities where the greatest number of men are unemployed and/or where necessary public work may be needed. The depression has brought into the cities millions of workers in the basic industries—mines, lumber camps, fisheries, and so on—who are now added to those locally out of work. Most of these men are able-bodied American citizens who are most anxious for work and who do not want charity. Each city of consequence, but particularly those in industrial centers, will find it necessary to arrange for local relief work on a large scale this winter to care for those normally productive workers. If the Government could take the lead and offer to enlist 10,000 men here, 2,000 there, and 50,000 in another locality, with the understanding that the labor of these men would be directed to useful undertakings and, in so far as was possible—weather and other conditions considered—in local undertakings, I believe the States, counties, and towns throughout the country would respond enthusiastically and furnish work to employ the million men and the money with which to pay for their cost.

In this way necessary work might be done, and on a national basis, which would result in lower cost and greater net return to the men working in money, comfort, and self-respect. National leadership in this crisis is an important factor which should not be overlooked. Most of us have little confidence in our local governments in matters of relief, but we have confidence in the United States Government and a respect for the Army.

8. The enlistment might be staggered so that men would be released in the spring to suit the opportunities for work district by district, discharges beginning in the South and gradually moving north as farm and industrial work opens up.

THE OBVIOUS ADVANTAGES

The advantages of this plan would be fairly evident. We have several million unemployed men who are at present inadequately fed and housed, fearful of the future, and potential sources of serious trouble, locally and nationally. If our Government were able to take 1,000,000 men out of this fierce competition for existence during the winter months, it would thereby greatly relieve the pressure on the others. The men enlisted would begin immediately to need regular rations of beef, pork, wheat, corn, and all sorts of canned vegetables and fruits, building up their own bodies and helping to absorb the present surpluses in goods of this kind. They would need shoes, clothing, dental and medical care. Some temporary housing would need to be built. Railways would be called on for the transportation of men, equipment, and supplies. We would have right in the depths of winter an added and important demand for goods of all kinds which would stimulate industries sufficiently to reemploy not fewer than 500,000 men.

We are facing at this time either a dole, whether it be national or local, or some one method which will temporarily, at least, reduce the number of the unemployed and increase the number of commodity consumers. Men enlisted in the United States Army put to useful labor and paid even a small amount for work which they can see is in the best interests of their communities, States, and the National Government will never have the feeling toward their experience that will come to their fellows who have to accept meal tickets, groceries, and house rent from charitable agencies, no matter how organized.

REFORM OF LEGAL PROCEDURE—ADDRESS BY JUSTICE FINCH, OF NEW YORK

Mr. WAGNER. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address recently delivered by a distinguished jurist of my State, Presiding Justice Edward R. Finch, of the appellate division, New York Supreme Court, in the nonpartisan series of addresses sponsored by the National Democratic Club of New York, February 6, 1932.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I

Mr. Chairman, friends and neighbors, ladies and gentlemen, in this nonpartisan series of addresses sponsored by the National Democratic Club I have chosen as my subject "Needed Changes in Legal Procedure and Administration."

Speaking to such a subject it would be out of place to consider it in any philosophical or moral aspect, which, for clarity, is often denominated the higher law, to distinguish it from the principles which immediately govern the courts and individuals. These principles are what is connoted by the term "law" to the average person, and are aptly termed for the English-speaking people "the common law." While this may seem somewhat obvious, yet it is very important to bear the distinction between law meaning enforcible rules of living from law meaning philosophy and morals, since certainty and clarity ought to be necessary attributes of the common law, while uncertainty and doubt are necessary attributes of philosophy and morals, as we understand them.

Before taking up needed changes in administration and procedure, will you permit me to say, because it does have a bearing on what is to follow, that at a time like this, when the world at large is perplexed by doubts and fears, there is an especial need for renewing our faith and our faith in our leaders. Conversely, these leaders must prove themselves worthy of our faith. Prosperity and luxury were fast undermining our character and moral fiber. America was losing her soul. We must now recover that character and moral fiber which have made us, as a Nation, able to administer our form of government, and, indeed, any form of government which we may adopt, in the opinion of competent authorities in other nations.

Now, how does this apply to an address on so dry a subject as legal administration and procedure? Because under our system of government the well-being of the judicial branch of the Government provides our greatest bulwark and anchor. In so loosely knit a form of government as ours, wherein so much real liberty is accorded to the individual, there must exist a forum to which everyone may repair with absolute confidence and with the facts existent that there at least his cause will be dealt with on the merits and without the intrusion of any other consideration than the merits. But even that is not all that should be demanded. In addition the courts must function efficiently. Justice may be so cumbersome or so retarded that it may become ineffectual. It does not seem to me too strong a statement to say that with our courts integrating conscientiously and efficiently we, as a Nation, can succeed with any form of government we may adopt, but with the courts out of kilter, no form of government can long endure.

II

In order to make the courts more efficient I should like to embody one remedy in a simple and easily understood idea. I wonder how many of us have ever thought through the effectiveness of an idea? Yet we have all experienced the impotency of the forces of evil as they break against the impelling force of an idea. Let me remind you how Rousseau's idea of equal opportunity for all, misinterpreted to mean that all men are created equal, has changed the course of the world. Now, what is the idea which will help to make the courts more efficient?

It is to put the responsibility for the needed changes and improvements in administration and procedure, and even in legal principles, squarely up to the judges who are daily dealing not only with such administration and procedure as a workman deals with his tools, but also are dealing with the principles of law as rules of living. Up to this time we have permitted the judges and the members of the legislature to play battledore and shuttlecock with the necessary improvements not only in legal principles but even in the rules of administration and procedure.

The result is that in some instances these rules of administration and procedure are the despair of the clients, who after all are the ones most vitally affected. Heretofore when there has been complaint about administration and procedure, we have permitted the judge complacently to say: "Why, that is a matter for the legislature, since they enact not only what shall be the law but also what shall be the rules of administration and procedure." On the other hand, the legislature does not realize the necessity for the needed improvements and changes, because the members of the legislature are not coming in daily contact with the courts, and have only a limited experience, born of a casual and intermittent acquaintance with these rules, with the result that nothing is done, and we go on with a system archaic in some respects and out of step with the evolution and development of concomitant lines of human endeavor. Ask anyone with experience as to how changes often take place in administration and procedure, and I believe you will find the answer to be that many changes arise out of the personal experience in a particular case of some member of the legislature. He then seeks to have legislation enacted changing the rules in accordance with his contentions in that particular case. It is unnecessary to say to this audience that this is about the worst way to have changes made in administration and procedure. With the judges therefore passing the responsibility to the legislature and the failure of the legislature to enact because of insufficient understanding in the matter, we have had to rely for real improvement upon the voluntary actions of groups of citizens, such as the associations of the bar, merchants' associations, chambers of commerce, and the like. I wish I had time to show you how much we are indebted for unselfish community service in this regard to the associations of the bar, to the merchants' associations, to chambers of commerce, and to other like bodies. But these associations at best must act through committees, who have only had a limited personal experience, and ofttimes must base their report upon the result unearthed by investigators, whereas the judges are dealing every day with administration and procedure as tools of their work. Thus we come to a fundamental postulate, which is that if effective leadership is to be had, you must be able to locate duty and responsibility. They can not be divided between two independent bodies. It seems to me that this duty and responsibility should be laid upon the judges. Once we have placed this duty and this responsibility definitely on the judges, and not divided between the judges and the legislature, we have made a great step forward.

But I did not invent this idea. Let us give praise where praise is due. The present governor of this State, Gov. Franklin D. Roosevelt, only recently urged that the State of New York should follow a policy of holding the judges responsible for the proper and efficient administration of the judicial branch of the Government.

Then we have another fine practical example of what happens when a judge does take such responsibility. I call attention to what Surrogate Foley has done in connection with the drafting and enactment of laws relating to decedents' estates and inheritances.

III

So far we have stressed the idea that leadership in making the necessary changes in judicial administration and procedure, and even in principles of law, should be considered by the judges and by the people as a part of the duty and responsibility of the judges. In line with this, it naturally follows that so far as judicial administration and procedure go, legislative enactments in reference to this should be removed from the civil practice, and the courts should have the power to prescribe the necessary procedure by rule of court. There are, as you know, a body of civil practice rules covering procedure in part, but judicial procedure in its entirety should be left to the judges to be regulated by rule of court. Given this power, they should be held absolutely responsible for its proper and efficient exercise. But some judges do not occupy judicial positions of sufficient importance to give them the power to make the necessary changes. Also from time to time there occurs the necessity for change in the principles of the law, which can only be made by an enactment of the legislature. As to needed changes arising in this manner it is necessary to have some duly constituted authority to act as a liaison body between the courts and the legislature. Chief Judge Cardozo emphasized the necessity of some such body and called it a "ministry of justice." Such a body does exist in many of the States now and is called a "judicial council." The name is unimportant, but some such body should be created in this State. In the creation of it, however, the duty and responsibility must not be taken from the judges of assuming the leadership for changes and improvements necessary in the judicial branch of the Government. Unless care is taken in this regard, we will substitute for what is now a responsibility divided between the legislature and the courts a responsibility triply divided between the legislature, a judicial council, and the courts.

We must also have a department where statistics of the work of the courts must be accurately and publicly kept. With the large number of courts necessary for the despatch of judicial business, there must be some place where accurate, truthful, and complete statistics can be publicly kept of what goes on in these courts. Many people think of this data as only making possible periodic surveys of the work of the courts, so that needed changes may be made not only in administration and procedure but in principles of law. Such statistical department, however, will be effective in producing efficiency in the courts. No public official likes to create an unworthy measure of his worth. It is unnecessary for me to tell this audience that human nature is inclined to go along the easiest way if it is not held up by the requirements of an office.

I suggest that there be created a State department of judicial statistics. In order to make this department effective I suggest that the items of statistics which shall be reported by the clerks of the various courts shall be plainly and completely specified, and that such reports shall be made by the clerks in accordance with the facts upon pain of dismissal. Otherwise a bureau of statistics may become a mere sham and of no value.

IV

There should also be such change in our administration and procedure as will insure fairness between litigants as respects the burdens and expenses of litigation. As our laws are now drawn, they encourage and invite litigation which is speculative and often without intrinsic merit and unduly favor a defendant who desires to profit by a wrongful breach of his contract obligations. Take the case of a defendant who has bought $10,000 worth of goods on credit, has sold the goods before the bill is due, and with the money in his pocket compels the seller to commence an action, in which he puts in a defense that the goods were defective. The plaintiff thereupon has to engage a lawyer to collect his claim. But the most the plaintiff can recover from the defendant is the amount of the claim, plus 6 per cent interest, together with a bill of costs so small that it is practically nominal. Not only is the bill of the plaintiff reduced by the amount which he has to pay to his attorney to collect and the expenses of the suit, but in so far as the defendant may delay the collection of the claim the defendant obtains an enforced loan at 6 per cent interest.

Furthermore, because of the delay to the plaintiff and because of the expense and lawyer's bill which the plaintiff is forced to bear, the defendant is in a position to make an advantageous settlement of the claim for much less than the face of the original bill, even though his claim that the goods were defective is wholly without merit. Even though the same defendant is unsuccessful in the lower court, he may appeal the case, and here again the bill of the lawyer which the plaintiff must retain upon the appeal, together with all other expenses of the appeal, must be added to the expenses and lawyer's bill for the trial and taken by the plaintiff out of the selling price of his goods, since all that he may again recover from the defendant is 6 per cent interest and what practically amounts to a nominal bill of costs upon appeal, as was the case upon the trial. A plaintiff, if successful, should be able to recover at least a part of the expense and a part of his lawyer's bill to which he has been put by the wrongful act of the defendant. In fairness he should recover all.

Take, likewise, the case of a plaintiff with a purely speculative claim. By joining with a lawyer who will agree to take the matter upon a speculative basis, he may bring suit against a defendant, and even if the defendant wins, he loses, because he can not recover from the plaintiff even a part of the expense of his counsel fee nor the greater part of his other expenses. Such a condition of the law encourages unworthy litigation and penalizes the honest litigant. A change should be here demanded by every business organization.

England, with the same common law as ours, has corrected this injustice upwards of 40 years ago.

V

Because of the need of speaking of more fundamental changes, I have not taken up with you what is known as the broadening of the summary-judgment rule. The adoption of this rule well illustrates how reluctant any profession is to change its old and accustomed way of doing things simply because any change, even for the better, is irksome. But in this the professional man is not very different from any one of us. Notice how uncomfortable we become if somebody suggests a change in our method of doing things, particularly when we have pursued this method for a long time. So it is with the members of the legal profession. They like to follow the old ruts and the old grooves.

This procedure, known as the summary-judgment rule, which permits a plaintiff with a just claim to strike out an answer which is false in fact and obtain his judgment, had been adopted in England for over 50 years before we enacted it here. And even when we did adopt it in 1921, the proponents of the change were so fearful lest it would fail that they only proposed a very limited application of the rule. We should make the rule more broadly applicable. There is no more reason why a false answer in a foreclosure suit should delay a plaintiff in securing his rightful judgment than if he had made a loan of money. Since the summary-judgment rule was originally enacted by rule of court, it can be changed easily, and, I predict, will be changed by the judges within a few weeks.

In urging before you these needed changes in administration and procedure, I do not wish, however, to give you any cause for discouragement. If there were time, I could take you back through history and show you that from the earliest days each generation has found fault with the efficiency of its courts. They still can be made more efficient, but they are not as inefficient as they used to be.

VI

May I give you two practical illustrations of the latest changes and show you what important consequences and results may follow from comparatively small changes?

For generations, or practically since the inauguration of the courts, we have had in the Supreme Court a daily call of the calendar to ascertain what cases were ready for trial. Of course, in a department like this, where there are thousands of cases to be tried, and therefore many trial parts, several hundred cases have to be called every day in order to provide a sufficient number of ready cases. This necessitated that each law office employ a number of clerks whose time was largely taken up in answering calendars. Each day prior to the trial of a case it was necessary to have witnesses ready. Thus there was unnecessarily wasted the time of the clerks of the attorneys, which added expense for the clients, the time of witnesses, and the time of the courts in calling the calendars.

On January 1, 1932, the appellate division of this department abolished in the supreme court the daily calendar calls and substituted a call but once a week. Thereafter the clerks of the court, according to a regular routine laid out for them, informed the attorneys in advance when the cases would be ready for trial, so that the trial counsel and their witnesses need assemble only once for the actual trial of the case. In addition, a result of far-reaching consequences was obtained, namely, that the trial parts of the supreme court during the month of January, 1932, disposed of practically 85 per cent more cases than have ever been disposed of in the history of the court. In other words, in January, 1931, with 17 parts of the court in session, there were 280 actual trials and inquests disposed of; whereas, in January, 1932, with the new system, with only 14 parts in session and an additional part in session for only two weeks of the month, 361 actual trials and inquests were disposed of. To express it in terms of percentages, 25 cases per part were disposed of under the new system as against 16½ cases under the old system. It appears now as if it will be possible to keep abreast of the present calendar without additional judges, whereas under the old system it would have been impossible.

Consider for a moment also what is known as the pooling system for jurors. This system, in brief, consists of having all jurors drawn assemble in comfort in a particular room instead of being drawn for each individual part of the court. As jurors are needed, they are obtained from the jury room. The result is that we need to summon only half as many jurors as formerly, and after a 5-day service we can give each juror a 2-year exemption. In addition, we save in fees in the supreme court alone a sum of almost $100,000 a year, the exact figures being $94,000. The jurors also have comforts which it was impossible to obtain for them when they were drawn for each separate part of the court.

Neither the pooling system for jurors nor the new method of assigning cases for trial has been adopted by the court of general sessions. In fairness to the judges of that court, this is partly due to the fact that our present Criminal Courts Building is physically inadequate to the demands which are now made upon it. I was hoping that in this period of unemployment we might have given employment for such a work as constructing a new Criminal Courts Building. I wish to express my appreciation for the willingness to cooperate on the part of the judges of the court of general sessions. I am hoping, and I believe, that with such cooperation we will be able within a few months to have both of these improvements installed in the court of general sessions.

VII

May I say in conclusion the changes which I have urged seem to me to be important and fundamental. Within the next 10 years we are going through one of the greatest evolutions that mankind has ever known. The development of the law may be termed a peaceful evolution of the new out of the old. The American people in the past have been particularly adept in altering and fitting the old garment of the law to new conditions, so that the evolution may take place lawfully and peacefully. The more efficient we make the administration and procedure of the law the easier we make it to alter the garment of the law so as to bring about evolution in the American way.

ADDRESS OF HON. CHARLES F. SCOTT BEFORE THE KANSAS DAY CLUB

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, on January 29, 1932, Hon. Charles F. Scott, former Congressman from Kansas, and one of the most distinguished citizens of my State, delivered a notable address at the Fortieth Annual Meeting of the Kansas Day Club held in Topeka. This club, formed to commemorate the admission of the State into the Union, is an important civic organization and numbers among its membership many of the most prominent citizens of Kansas. For more than 30 years Mr. Scott has been one of the leading journalists of the State and a close student of public questions. He is a most able speaker, and I believe there will be general interest in the views he expresses on public affairs in this address. I desire, therefore, to ask that the address be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, and it is as follows:

A CALL TO ARMS

Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, I have come nearly 2,000 miles to sound before the nearly 2,000 Republicans assembled here from all over Kansas, a call to arms. I have come to summon you to a new battle for the old faith. I have come to appeal to your Republican pride. I have come to awaken, if I may, your Republican enthusiasm. I have come to arouse the fighting spirit which has carried the Republican Party to victory in so many hard-fought campaigns. I have come to bid you renew your vows of allegiance to the party which, through three-quarters of a century of peace and war, has given the great Republic matchless and indomitable leadership. I have come to ask you to forget everything that has divided you in the past and to remember only that you are Republicans. I have come to challenge your attention to the historic fact that never since Abraham Lincoln has the Republican Party lost an election upon the issues it has championed; it has lost only when there was dissension in its own ranks. I have come to remind you that on the issues of this day the position of the Republican Party is precisely as impregnable as it was four years ago when it swept the country with an unparalleled majority. I have come to tell you that Herbert Hoover is just as great a man, just as true a patriot, just as wise a statesman, just as unflinching a defender of constitutional government as he was when he carried 37 States of this Union by majorities unprecedented. I have come to implore you to cast out fear, to put on your fighting armor, to summon up your fighting blood, and to fall in line, head up and breast forward, behind the great and gallant leader who for three years, with unwearied patience, with dauntless courage, with unrivaled wisdom and statesmanship has been fighting the battles, not of our party alone but of the whole country, not of our country alone but of the whole world, and march with him to certain victory.

THE ATTACK ON THE PRESIDENT

This great leader has not come off scatheless. He has been criticised and attacked as none of our Presidents with the exception of Washington and Lincoln have been criticised and attacked. Hardly were the returns all in from the last election when the orders went out from Democratic headquarters to "Smear Hoover." Underwritten by John J. Raskob, to whom incidentally the Democratic Party owes more than it ever owed to any other man living or dead, a publicity bureau was established and with diabolical cleverness it entered at once upon a campaign of calumny such as American politics has rarely witnessed. There was no delay. The inauguration ceremonies were hardly over before the assault began. The President's words were distorted, his acts were misrepresented, his motives were impugned, by every method ingenuity could devise the effort was made to poison the public mind against him, to break down his popularity and destroy the confidence the people had in him. Men were out of employment and they were told it was because of the "Hoover Panic." Prices of farm products were low and farmers were told it was because of the policies of the Farm Board which Hoover directed. Many families suffered from the drought and they were told their sufferings would have been more adequately relieved but for Hoover's interference with the desires of Congress.

What was the inspiration of all these assaults? Politics! Politics, pure and simple. Mr. Hoover was in politics. He was in office. He was the leader of the Republican Party. He doubtless would be renominated. Unless he were broken down he would be reelected and the Republican Party would remain in power. And so the orders went out to "Smear Hoover" to the end that the Republican Party might be defeated. It is all perfectly simple. And yet multitudes of people, doubtless unconsciously, have been influenced by this purely political Democratic propaganda.

CRITICS NOT LEADERS

The President has been criticized and attacked. But among all the raucous voices raised against him is there one coming from a man who has himself solved the problem that he blames Hoover for having failed to solve? Is there one who has given any reason for hope that by voting for some unknown candidate and against Mr. Hoover the clouds that he is blamed for failing to dissipate will suddenly and miraculously be dispelled? Amid all the clamor has one leader arisen who knows of something that will restore prosperity to the world and has proclaimed that sovereign remedy? The answer to all these questions is No! And when this truth is realized does not all the angry uproar resolve itself into the familiar spectacle of men who, unable to get into the game themselves, sit on the sidelines and crab and complain?

A REVIEW OF HISTORY

The President has been criticized and attacked. He has been charged with responsibility for the business recession of the past two years in terms which left the necessary implication that if he had not been elected the trouble would never have occurred. Well, let us review a little history. In the spring of 1914 the world was prosperous and happy. At least that part of the world from the Ural Mountains to Patagonia was prosperous and happy. All over Europe kings were seated securely on their thrones. Currencies were stable, resting upon a foundation of gold. Government debts were carried easily. Taxes were light. Prices were satisfactory and labor was employed. All over South America similar conditions prevailed. Here in our own country our national debt was floating along at about a billion dollars, carried in bonds that bore 2 per cent interest. Federal taxation was so light that nobody ever mentioned it. Everybody had a job that wanted one and was able to work. There was so little politics that about the most exciting topic was whether Taft and T. R. had got over their mad spell and made up again.

And then, like a bolt from the blue, the Great War burst upon the startled world, and for four years 20 nations concentrated all their strength and all their resources upon the grisly business of killing men.

When the war was over what a different world it was! Victors and vanquished alike were prostrate. Thrones had been overturned. Dynasties had perished. Budgets were hopelessly out of balance. National debts were piled mountain high, and taxes mounted with them. Currencies were unsettled. Industries were dislocated. All Europe was a welter of political, economic, and financial chaos. Here in America, although the war had touched us lightly so far as the actual conflict was concerned, we had spent $40,000,000,000. Part of it we paid as we went along, but in the end our national debt was $26,000,000,000. During those two years this Government spent more money than it had expended all told for all purposes during the first 125 years of its existence. Did you know that? Do you realize that this war will have cost us $150,000,000,000 before we have finished with it? Do you realize that, largely because of this war, 85 cents out of every dollar of tax money that comes into the Federal Treasury goes out to pay for war, past and future? Eighty-five cents for war, 15 cents for every other Government purpose. These are some of the things the war did to Europe and to ourselves. I do not need to recount in detail the things that have happened since the war, directly resulting from it—the financial convulsions that made the currency of Germany and France and half a score of other European countries valueless, that ultimately forced even Great Britain herself to abandon the gold standard, that brought about 14 revolutions in South America, that led to the wild orgy of speculation in our own country ending with the crash that wiped out uncounted fortunes.

Does any sane mind have to seek further than the World War and its inevitable aftermath for the causes that have brought about the economic conditions of the past two years? Suppose there had been no war. Suppose Europe had continued peaceful and busy and prosperous, affording an ever-enlarging market for the products of our fields and factories. Would we have been worrying now about overproduction, about low farm prices, and unemployment? Suppose our national debt had not been piled up to inconceivable figures. Would we be confronted now with a huge deficit and perplexed as to the means of meeting it? It is too obvious for argument that every great problem which now confronts us, both domestic and foreign, harks back to the war—the war, and not to Herbert Hoover. That is a conclusion which will not be challenged—except by those who seek to make political capital out of human misery.

HOOVER HAS BEEN THE LEADER

Herbert Hoover was not responsible for the war and he is not responsible for any of the problems that have grown out of the war. But he has attacked those problems as if he were responsible for them. He has brought all the strength of his powerful mind, all the resources of his superb genius for organization, to the service of his country in this emergency. And let it be remembered that he is the only one of our Presidents who has ever tried to make good times out of bad times. In the last hundred years there have been 15 major depressions. The Presidents in office, when they fell upon the country, have described them and deplored them but they did nothing about them. In other periods of depression the banks have had to look out for themselves, the industries have had to look out for themselves, the unemployed have had to look out for themselves, the farmers have had to look out for themselves. In these other periods, in a word, when business has found itself bogged down in a morass it has had to dig itself out the best it could without any help, without even any suggestion from the White House.

But Herbert Hoover is not built on those lines. When he sees anyone in trouble his first instinct is to reach out and help. That is what took him into Belgium before we got into the war. That is what took him when the war was over into 20 countries of Europe where women and children were dying for lack of food and medical care. That is what made him the greatest humanitarian of all times. When he sees anyone in trouble he just has to reach out and help. And so when the crash came in 1929 and he saw there was likely to be slashing of wages and consequent strikes and riots, as there had been in every other depression, he called the captains of industry and the leaders of labor into conference and obtained agreements as a result of which there has been greater harmony between capital and labor these past two years than ever before under similar conditions. He saw there was likely to be widespread unemployment and so he launched a program of construction, not only under the Federal Government but under State, municipal, and corporation authorities, as a result of which hundreds of thousands of men have been employed who would otherwise have been idle. He saw that banks all over the country were in danger of failing, not because they were insolvent but because their resources were not readily available, and he brought about the organization of a gigantic credit corporation which is carrying hundreds of banks safely through the crisis and saving their thousands of depositors from loss and suffering. Only a few days ago a Democratic congressman declared that had it not been for this credit corporation every bank in his State would have failed. The President saw that thousands of farmers who had borrowed money from the Federal land banks were likely to lose their farms because the banks had not sufficient capital to carry them, and so he asked Congress to place $100,000,000 at the disposal of the banks, and Congress promptly did it.

The President saw that many key industries and many lines of business, including building and loan associations and insurance companies that carry farm loans, were in danger by the closing of the ordinary credit channels, and so he asked Congress to create a Reconstruction Finance Corporation with a vast potential capital of $2,000,000,000 as a safeguard against further paralyzing influences and shocks, and again Congress promptly responded. And so, one after another, the President has brought forward great measures of stabilization, rehabilitation, and reconstruction, until, all told, he has presented to the Congress and to the country the most comprehensive and far-reaching program ever offered by any leader in any country at any time in the world's history.

And remember it is Herbert Hoover who has done all this. It was not a banker who came forward with a plan for steadying the credit situation. It was not a labor leader who pointed the way to industrial peace. It was not a captain of industry who proposed great works of construction to combat unemployment. It was not a farm leader who suggested increasing the capital of the farm-loan banks as a means of relieving farm debtors. It was not a great business genius who called for the creation of the gigantic and far-reaching Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Least of all was it any of his critics who brought forward any of these measures. They were too busy denouncing the President for doing nothing. "I complain," "I protest," "I denounce," these critics were declaring. And paying no attention to them, the President has been calmly saying: "I propose," "I suggest," "I recommend." Who has rendered the greater service to the country, the men who have sat on the side lines, crabbing and complaining, or the stalwart, untiring, and courageous leader who all day and every day has played the game?

SUPPOSE SMITH HAD BEEN ELECTED

The President has been criticized and attacked. The people have been told they made a great mistake when they voted as they did in 1928, that instead of Herbert Hoover they should have elected Alfred E. Smith. Well, let us suppose they had done that and that for the past three years Alfred E. Smith had been sitting in the White House. The stock market would have collapsed in 1929 just the same. Does anybody doubt that? The march of untoward events in Europe would have gone on just the same. The civil war in China, and now the disturbance in Manchuria and at Shanghai would have gone on just the same. The revolutions which have unseated eight governments in South America would have gone on just the same. With our foreign markets restricted by these events and the conditions arising from them, unemployment among our workers would have followed just the same and the prices of farm products would have declined just the same. I presume no sane and fair-minded man will deny that if Alfred E. Smith had been elected in 1928 he would have been confronted by precisely the same problems that have faced Mr. Hoover. So the only important question is, What would he have done about them?

Fortunately, we have an answer to that question. Mr. Smith himself has answered it. At the great Jackson Day dinner in Washington, January 8—at which with a singular sense of the fitness of things the three speakers were the men who in the last three campaigns had led their party to inglorious defeat, each one repudiated more decidedly than the one before—at this Jackson Day dinner Governor Smith brought forward his program of reconstruction, his sovereign remedies for the ills that now afflict us. And what were those remedies?

Bonds and beer!

BONDS AND BEER!

Does that sound incredible to you? Do you think I must be misrepresenting the governor, or that I am merely joking? Well, frankly, I do not blame you, but here are his words:

"Now it would be idle to find fault and I have some constructive suggestions. I know that what I am going to suggest will at least in the beginning be received probably with an unpopular note; and that is an issue of Federal bonds for necessary public works and building."

After an argument of several minutes in support of this suggestion, the governor said:

"And what about prohibition? Here we are actually spending $100,000,000 a year in a senseless, useless, fruitless attempt to enforce prohibition. But the $100,000,000 for enforcement is a flea bite. It is a flea bite. Think of the billions we are kicking away from us that would come in in taxation."

So that is what we would be having if we did not have Hoover. The only relief for unemployment Governor Smith can think of is public works, a remedy President Hoover proposed more than two years ago and which he has applied without a bond issue as far as it can be properly carried. And the only cure the governor can think of for the Treasury deficit is to do away with prohibition and restore the traffic in intoxicating liquors and collect from this traffic the "billions" of dollars of taxes we are now "kicking away."

Bonds and beer! With a man in the White House whose mind could not rise above that level can you imagine what these past two years would have brought us in added unemployment and in increased financial and economic confusion and chaos? And what would have become of the proud place we now hold in world leadership? Can you imagine Premier MacDonald and Premier Laval and Premier Grandi coming across the Atlantic to consult Al Smith! Can you imagine the ideas of Al Smith dominating the London Naval Conference? Can you imagine the mind of Al Smith conceiving the German moratorium? Can you imagine Al Smith standing out as the acknowledged leader of the forces making for world peace and international good will?

Bonds and beer!

Honestly, ladies and gentlemen, do you really and truly believe that the people made a mistake when they chose Herbert Hoover in 1928?

A WORD ABOUT PROPHETS

Of course Governor Smith did not devote all his Jackson Day speech to what he chose to call his constructive program. He devoted a good deal of his time to criticism of the President as a prophet, pointing out with fine sarcasm the contrast between what the President said would happen and what actually has happened. Well, if one were disposed to return a Roland for an Oliver he might turn to the prospectus of the Empire State Building issued by the governor as president of that great enterprise in which prospective purchasers of bonds were assured that it would be filled as soon as finished and contrast that prediction with the present reported fact that the structure, now a little more than a year old, is 12 per cent occupied. Or if he wanted to go a little farther back he might recall the prediction of the whole Democratic Party in 1916 that if President Wilson were elected he would keep us out of war. Or he might come back again to modern times and discover in a radio address delivered by the Hon. John J. Raskob, October 27, 1930, this paragraph:

"In closing let me say that no country in the world, not even our own, was ever in as splendid a condition to go forward and enjoy a period of prosperity as our country is to-day. Everything has been thoroughly deflated and business is now turning upward. The momentum is necessarily slow at first but within three months, with the impetus the automobile industry is sure to provide, starting with the January shows, we will quickly leave depression behind and all be singing Happy Days Are Here Again."

And so if the President was mistaken in assuming that the depression would be of shorter duration than he once thought, he was, at least, in good Democratic company—if Democratic company can ever be good.

WHO INCURRED THE DEBTS?

The President has been criticized and attacked on the score that his German moratorium has opened the way for the cancellation of the debts owed us by European powers. The first thing to be said in answer to that criticism is that on every proper occasion, and in the moratorium message itself, the President declared that he is opposed to the cancellation of these debts.

But the next thing is to ask and answer the question, Who incurred these debts?

To answer that question with authority I consulted a report made by the Senate Judiciary Committee during the first session of the Sixty-seventh Congress, called by President Harding within a few days following his inauguration to make an investigation of the status of foreign loans. This report is known as Senate Document No. 86, Sixty-seventh Congress, second session, and may be obtained by anyone who cares to check up the following statements. During the progress of the war approximately $8,000,000,000 was loaned by our Government to the governments associated with us in the conflict. These loans were made under authority of various acts of Congress, every one of which explicitly declared that in exchange for the money thus provided them foreign governments should give us their bonds bearing interest at the same rate as our own bonds by the sale of which the money was raised and having the same maturity date. The Wilson administration paid no attention to this requirement but handed over the money on the I O U of the governments receiving it. In return for the $8,000,000,000 thus advanced this Government held merely the demand notes of other governments with no rate of interest stipulated and no date of maturity specified. All of the acts of Congress under which these loans were made provided that the authority to make such loans should cease upon the termination of hostilities. In the face of this provision the Wilson administration advanced to foreign governments $1,500,000,000 after the armistice had been signed.

The Senate report from which I am quoting makes it clear that Treasury Department officials of the United States were aware of the fact that they had no legal authority to continue the loaning of money, raised from the people of the United States by the sale of Liberty bonds and by taxation for the purpose of prosecuting the war, after all hostilities had ceased. As evidence of this fact the report shows that two Secretaries of the Treasury—first Mr. McAdoo, then Mr. Glass, went before Congress and asked for authority to make these postwar loans, and Congress refused their requests. But in spite of the fact that the authority had been asked for and explicitly denied, the Treasury Department continued making loans to foreign governments for reconstruction purposes after all hostilities had ended. Money raised from the American people for the purpose of the prosecution of the war against Germany found its way into Germany with the sanction of the Treasury Department of the United States while Germany was yet our technical enemy. Forty-eight millions of dollars of the American people's Liberty loan money was used for the purpose of sending supplies into Austria while that country was still our enemy. Millions of dollars of this Liberty loan fund was loaned to foreign governments and by them loaned to various relief and reconstruction organizations, thus circumventing the act of Congress. Money was loaned by the United States to these various governments so that they could repay it to the United States as interest on loans already made. Millions of dollars of this Liberty loan money were loaned to Great Britain after all hostilities had ceased for the purpose of allowing her to build up her export trade and return to a normal basis. Thus the money raised from the American people to prosecute the war was used by Great Britain in competition with American foreign trade. One hundred thousand dollars of America's Liberty loan money was used for expenses of the Russian delegation at the peace conference. Twenty-six thousand dollars of America's Liberty loan money was used for the expenses of the delegates from Liberia to the peace conference. Millions of dollars from this fund were loaned to governments not then actually in existence.

Czechoslovakia was not a nation until it was created by the treaty of peace of June, 1919. And yet American tax money went into her treasury. Serbia had no parliamentary form of government during the time it received loans from this country. Moneys from this fund went to the aid of three separate de facto governments in Russia, namely, the Kerenski government, the Kolchak government, and the Wrangel government. The Treasury Department, with the sanction of President Wilson, continued making advances to foreign governments at the very time when it was holding consultations and parleys with these governments on the possible cancellation of all debts, as proposed by these governments.

Various branches of the United States Government made payments of cash to foreign governments which governments were indebted to the United States, both on loans and interest when those payments should have been made to the United States Treasury and credited to the account of the government to which they were due. Numerous loans were made from this fund for the purpose of increasing our influence in the European political situation at the peace conference; not for the purpose of prosecution of the war. The Treasury allowed the payment out of this fund of interest and bonds of foreign governments held by private citizens of the United States, thus giving private loans preference over the United States loans. As late as January 10, 1920, the Treasury Department made loans to governments supposed to be engaged in war with enemies of the United States after the peace treaty had been signed and the governments receiving the money were actually and technically at peace with Germany. And let me repeat that in making these loans, as well as in making the loans while the war was in progress, the Treasury Department accepted demand obligations from foreign governments when all of the sections of the acts authorizing these loans provided that they must be exchanged for obligations of the same tenor and effect as the particular Liberty loan by which the money was raised. These demand notes, having no maturity date and no definite interest-paying date, made it an easy matter for the foreign governments to defer the payments, both of principal and interest, and make it an easy matter for them now to quibble about the payment of the debts.

Let me repeat that every statement I have made with respect to these transactions has been taken directly from official records and can not be challenged. That was the unholy mess to which the Harding and Coolidge and Hoover administrations fell heir. I am not disposed to be hypercritical concerning those transactions which took place while the war was still in progress, although even war would seem to be hardly justification or excuse for the plain violation of law. But what can be said in defense of the loans made after the war was over when the law explicitly forbade them, and when Congress, asked for legislation to authorize such loans, deliberately refused to grant it? I leave that question to be answered by those who are criticizing the President because he has not immediately brought order out of the chaos and confusion which a Democratic administration handed to him.

THE FARM PROBLEM

The President has been criticized and attacked because the Farm Board has been unable to maintain the price of farm products at a profitable figure. Let us see just how reasonable that criticism is.

Until the close of the World War the problem of the American farmer was one of production. From the time of its organization the work of the Department of Agriculture in its efforts to help the farmer was concentrated upon aids to production, to eliminate pests, to improve varieties of seeds, to introduce better methods of farm management. But with the close of the war the American farmer found himself faced with competition such as he had never known before. We had increased our own wheat area by 60,000,000 acres. Argentina, Australia, and Canada had brought into production 28,000,000 additional wheat acres, an increase of 300 per cent. The countries that were at war have come into heavy production under the stimulus of high tariffs and other protective measures, with the result that the world now produces more wheat than it can eat. There has been an enormous increase in dairy and meat production also. Canada, Argentina, and New Zealand have increased their exports of butter from 50,000,000 to 350,000,000 pounds annually, while Uruguay and Argentina have increased their beef exports from 300,000,000 to 2,000,000,000 pounds per year.

The problem of the American farmer, therefore, has completely changed. It is no longer a question of production; it is the question of selling. With his unfailing business acumen President Hoover recognized this changed situation and accordingly laid before the Congress when he called it in special session soon after his inauguration in 1929 a bill designed to aid the farmer to sell his crops. This bill was entitled "the agricultural marketing act," and its purpose and intent were defined in the following words:

"It is hereby declared to be the policy of Congress to promote the effective merchandising of agricultural commodities in interstate and foreign commerce, so that the industry of agriculture will be placed on a basis of economic equality with other industries, and to that end to protect, control, and stabilize the currents of interstate and foreign commerce in the marketing of agricultural commodities and other food products."

Never before in the history of this or any other nation has a government given a group of people a bill of rights with such far-reaching possibilities as is given the American farmer in this legislation. If it had been put into effect when times were normal, I think it will be generally conceded that by this time it would have been recognized as one of the most beneficent pieces of legislation for the promotion of agriculture ever devised by any parliamentary body.

But before the Farm Board, appointed to operate the law, was fully organized the crash of Wall Street's speculative bubble began, carrying with it all other speculative markets, including those in wheat and cotton futures. At the same time there swept over the whole world a business cataclysm which demoralized all the ordinary and usual operations of world commerce. Into this world chaos of industrial, financial, and agricultural demoralization the Farm Board was suddenly projected.

The immediate demand made upon it was that it stabilize the wheat and cotton markets by purchasing large quantities of wheat and cotton. Everybody, including the Farm Board itself, now recognizes that this was a mistake. But those who criticize the work of the board in this respect should not forget that the policy it adopted was urged upon it with the greatest vehemence by every national farm organization, backed up by the Senators and Representatives and governors of the States particularly concerned. Here in Kansas we surely have not forgotten that in the summer of 1930 Senator CAPPER and Governor Reed went all the way to Washington to urge, nay to demand, that the Farm Board buy 100,000,000 bushels of wheat. And they are not to be criticized too severely, any more than the Farm Board is to be criticized for yielding to their demand. At that time there was no one bold enough to predict that the price of wheat and cotton would sink to the lowest levels ever known. It was universally believed that if the Farm Board would hold a quantity of wheat and cotton off the market during the time when the new crop was being sold, satisfactory prices would return and be maintained. That is precisely what would have happened if times had been normal; and if it had happened thus the agricultural marketing act would have been hailed as a piece of divinely inspired legislation and Herbert Hoover's fame as a friend of the farmer would have been secure.

But times were not normal. World conditions were such that the hope could not be realized. The price of wheat and cotton continued to fall and the policy had to be abandoned. As the result of the experiment, the Government may lose some money. But it is only fair to admit that the purchase of wheat at the time it was done seemed imperative in order to avert widespread disaster. Banks west of the Mississippi were carrying 100,000,000 bushels of wheat and probably as much more east of the river when the prices in Winnipeg and London began to break. In a single day 62 banks closed in one State alone and panic was everywhere possible.

If the wheat loans had been called generally, as they inevitably would have been but for the action of the Farm Board, the price would have broken far below the figure it did reach, and business, big and little, banks, large and small, would have been forced into liquidation, with incalculable loss to their depositors and to the communities they served. In like manner the purchase of cotton by the Farm Board saved scores of banks in the South from closing and hundreds if not thousands of planters from bankruptcy. Not only was this financial disaster averted, but by the operations of the Farm Board it is estimated that the 1929 and 1930 cotton crops were sold for approximately $300,000,000 more than they would have been if thrown immediately on the market, and that the wheat crop of 1930 brought the farmers $340,000,000 more than they would have realized but for the operations of the Farm Board.

But it should be remembered that the wheat and cotton stabilization operations of the Farm Board have been but one of its activities, and one that in normal times would rarely if ever be involved. Realizing, as I remarked a moment ago, that the big problem of the farmer of this day is to sell at the least cost and to the best advantage what he produces, the board has been quietly and powerfully building up cooperative organizations throughout the country, aiding them, getting them better equipped and organized and ready to do their helpful work. These organization activities extend to every important farm commodity. There are three-quarters of a million more farmers in cooperatives now than there were two years ago, and the cooperatives themselves, with few exceptions, are better established. With a return to normal conditions, the benefit that will accrue to the farmers through the constructive work of the Farm Board will be easily seen and greatly appreciated. It is because they are looking forward to these benefits that all the important farm organizations in America are stanchly supporting the farm marketing act, and the Republican Party will have no occasion to apologize for it or to run away from it.

THE HAWLEY-SMOOT LAW

The President has been criticized and attacked because he signed a tariff bill which, it is alleged, did not come within the specifications he laid down for the guidance of Congress. Well, let us clear away the underbrush of false statement and misrepresentation and get at the truth about the Hawley-Smoot bill. The critics allege that the President asked for a limited revision of the tariff and that he got a general revision. That is the charge. The Tariff Commission reports that of the 3,300 dutiable items mentioned in the bill 890 were altered and 2,170 were untouched. That is the truth.

The critics charge that the President asked that the tariff be revised specially in the interest of agriculture and that instead of this being done it was revised in the interest of industry. The Tariff Commission says that of all the increases in the bill, 93 per cent are upon products of agricultural origin, while only 7 per cent are upon commodities of strictly nonagricultural origin. Not only were duties increased upon the things the farmer has to sell, but 130 imported articles, the things the farmer specially has to buy, were placed on the free list.

The critics charge that the Hawley-Smoot law is the highest tariff law ever enacted. The Tariff Commission says that within the past 40 years there have been four that carried higher duties—and one of them was a Democratic measure, the Mills bill.

The critics charge that by reason of its high rates the law has wrecked our foreign trade, that other nations will not buy here because they can not sell here. Nothing could be farther from the truth. To cite just two examples: In the fiscal year 1929 British South Africa sold in the United States only $9,000,000 worth of goods, but she bought in our markets $63,000,000 worth of commodities. The same year we sold to Japan only $259,000,000 worth of things, but we bought from Japan $431,000,000 worth. Let us broaden the field a little.

During the normal years 1924–1927, inclusive, 19 representative countries, comprising our leading customers, purchased 20.7 per cent of their imports from the United States, while during the first year of the Hawley-Smoot law these same countries bought 20 per cent of their imports from us, a loss of only seven-tenths of 1 per cent. And yet the critics say the law has wrecked our foreign trade. The truth is that business is cold blooded. It does not go by favor. It goes by price list. Men of all nations sell in the best market they can find, and they buy where they can buy cheapest. Without doubt we could attract a great flood of foreign goods to our markets by lowering our tariff walls, but that would be only to displace our domestic production with consequent increase of unemployment, while it would not create a market for a single additional dollar's worth of American products in foreign countries.

There are the answers to the attacks of the critics upon the Hawley-Smoot law, every one of them refuted by the official records.

DEMOCRATS REPUDIATE THEIR OWN ATTACKS

Not only are these attacks refuted by the facts, but they have been in effect repudiated by the Democrats themselves. When the Democrats found themselves in control of the House of Representatives and the duty of dealing with the tariff devolved upon them, did they introduce a bill to reduce the rates they had so loudly proclaimed were extortionate? They did not! Their leader, the Hon. HENRY T. RAINEY, frankly declared on the floor of the House that they did not dare to lower the present rates because if they did our markets would be flooded with foreign goods—which is precisely what the Republicans have been saying all along. But they had to save their faces by bringing in some sort of a tariff bill, and so they brought in and passed a measure which did not touch a single rate. It contained just two sections.

One of these cut the life out of the flexible provisions of the present law by providing that the reports of the Tariff Commission should be made to Congress instead of to the President; and the other called for an international economic conference with a view to lowering excessive tariff duties and eliminating discriminatory and unfair trade practices, preventing retaliatory tariff measures and economic wars and promoting fair, equal, and friendly trade and commercial relations between nations. Remember that under the present law when the Tariff Commission, composed of three Republicans and three Democrats, recommends a change in any existing duty the President, if he approves, can put it into effect in 30 days. There is no politics in it and no disturbance of business. The Democratic bill would have the reports of the Tariff Commission turned into the Congress where there would be endless debate, logrolling, business uncertainty and all the evils that accompany the revision of the tariff when it is made the football of politics. The second section of the Democratic bill, calling for an international economic conference, virtually asks other countries to write our tariff laws for us, a privilege which we must certainly reserve for ourselves. The truth is, of course, that the bill is an empty and meaningless gesture—a pitiable confession that the bold attacks they made upon the Hawley-Smoot law when they thought they would have no responsibility with regard to it were for political purposes only and had no foundation in fact.

RAIDS ON THE TREASURY

The President has been criticized and attacked because he has stood between the Public Treasury and those who would raid it in the alleged interest of unemployment relief. The President has declared, "We can not squander ourselves into prosperity," and he is standing unflinchingly for cutting governmental expenses to the lowest limit compatible with the proper functioning of the Government. But have you noticed what his critics have done?

During the first three weeks of this Congress bills were introduced calling for the expenditure of $29,000,000,000 in the course of the next five years, over and above the regular Budget. And most of these bills were introduced by Senators and Representatives who have been the most bitter and malignant critics of the President. Some of these bills, carrying billions of dollars, in all probability will pass the House and Senate. But are not you glad there is a man in the White House who will veto them? And do not you think we would better keep him there to guard against similar raids in the future?

A THREATENING EVIL

The fact that these extravagant bills have been introduced and for the purpose they declare should warn us to be on our guard against one of the most insidious evils that threatens our national life. In times such as those through which we are now passing there is always danger that sound principles of government and wise measures of statesmanship may be set aside by the plausible appeals of sincere but unthinking men who imagine that our difficulties are due in some obscure way to our form of government; who pretend that economic ills, which have grown out of a long succession of events, can be cured overnight by the prescription of some untried remedy; that immutable economic laws can be set aside and superseded by some legislative enactment. It was from the danger of following such leadership that the President warned the people when in his Indianapolis speech he used these significant words:

"The issue is whether we shall go on with our American system * * * or shall directly or indirectly regiment the population into a bureaucracy to serve the state, use force instead of cooperation in plans and thereby direct every man as to what he may or may not do."

In these words the President named the great issue in this and in many coming campaigns.

Some of the people may not see it now. Other things blur their vision—tariff, farm relief, prohibition, foreign commerce, and unemployment.

But the penetrating eye of the President, looking beneath the superficial, looking beyond the limited horizon of the here and the now, sees to the heart of the great problem and knows that it reaches to the very foundation of the Republic; and so in solemn words he warns us. Thus far America has been built upon a system which holds that the major purpose of a state is to protect the people and to give them equality of opportunity; that the basis of all happiness is in development of the individual; that the sum of national progress can only be gaged by the progress of the individual; that we should steadily build up cooperation among the people themselves to these ends.

There is the real issue—individualism or collectivism—the republic or the soviet.

This issue in set terms may not be found out in this campaign, but the outcome of this campaign will have a very direct bearing on it, one way or the other. The Republican Party stands for the American system. The coalition that will oppose the Republican Party, in Congress and out, is fighting for measures which, if adopted, will undermine the entire fabric of our Government. It is fighting for a creed foreign to our people. It is asking us to abandon the philosophy America has followed for 150 years. Let us not be caught off our guard.

RALLY TO OUR LEADER

The President is being criticised and attacked. It is not Herbert Hoover against whom all these shafts are directed. Let us never forget that. It is the President of the United States. It is the leader of the Republican Party who is being assailed with all these envenomed darts. He has made no reply. He has "kept his head while all about him were losing theirs" and blaming it on him. He has gone straight on with his duty. He has taken no vacation. He is carrying the heaviest load of any man in America.

A newspaper writer who called on him the other day declared that he had aged 20 years in appearance in the three years since his inauguration. Those of us who see him frequently can see almost daily the lines of public care cutting deeper into his face. He is our President. He is our party leader. He can not answer for himself the savage assaults that are made upon him. Then in Heaven's name can not we answer for him? Are we to stand by silent and consenting while he is stoned to his political death? Or shall we make his cause our own and make his battle our own?

In the course of a long life it has fallen to my lot to travel rather widely. I have gone down to the sea in many ships and have sailed on many voyages. Most of them were in fair weather and on quiet waters. But I remember one that was not so. We were on the North Atlantic, not far out of the path of the icebergs, homeward bound, when we ran into foul weather. For three days and nights the storm beat upon the ship with unforgettable fury. And during those three days and nights the captain never left the bridge. The passengers were safe in the sheltered cabins below the wave-swept decks. Then gradually the skies cleared, the winds subsided, the waves became laughing ripples on a sun-drenched sea. And for the first time in three days the captain entered the dining room and walked unsteadily to his place at the head of the table. His eyes were heavy, his face was furrowed, and every expression and attitude betrayed the terrific strain through which he had passed. Did the passengers revile him for bringing on the storm? Did they complain about the way he had navigated the ship? Did they suggest that he ought to be thrown overboard and a new captain chosen? They did not! With a fine spontaneous impulse as he entered the door they came to their feet and gave him three resounding cheers!

EMERGENCY CREDIT EXPANSION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3616) to improve the facilities of the Federal reserve system for the service of commerce, industry, and agriculture, to provide means for meeting the needs of member banks in exceptional circumstances, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is advised that the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. MORRISON] had the floor when the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business and afterwards recessed last evening, and that that Senator has been detained from the Chamber temporarily.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia desire to address the Senate?

Mr. GLASS. No; I merely wish to proceed with the consideration of the bill.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, I should like to ask the attention of the Senate for only a few moments.

Mr. GLASS. Very well.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, the principal purpose of the pending bill, known as the Glass-Steagall bill, is to overcome the fear that has gripped finance and paralyzed business. One of its features is designed to offset the hoarding of currency by providing for an emergency circulation of Federal reserve notes secured by Government bonds. The other provisions are calculated and designed to revitalize the confidence of bankers and bank depositors by making certain that if their paper available for discount at Federal reserve banks should be exhausted other assets may be used during the emergency as a basis of credit. The measure of the value of the changes in the banking laws contemplated by the bill can only be determined by experience. The bill will probably prevent the depletion of gold reserves to the danger point should that again be threatened, and it should cause a discontinuance of runs on banks.

The Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] in an address yesterday analyzed the bill and fully explained its provisions. He and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT] have been diligent in the preparation of a measure known as the Glass bill, which contemplates many important changes in the banking laws. Some of those changes, I am prepared to say, from a study of them, are fairly calculated to safeguard against errors that experience has shown are likely to recur.

An editorial in the Washington Post published on February 15 characterized the Glass-Steagall bill as one of the measures in the President's program, and numerous administration papers have named it "the Hoover bill." This is typical of comments by administration spokesmen and newspapers. Anyone reading or hearing such statements without knowledge of the history of the proposed legislation would conclude, naturally, that the President first suggested the measure.

Democrats in both Houses of Congress have cooperated with the President and his party associates in the preparation and passage of so-called emergency measures; but when enactments representing the best thought and the untiring efforts of members of both parties—indeed, of all parties—are claimed by Republican leaders as the achievement of President Hoover alone, the Democrats in the Congress are not only justified—they are almost required to call attention to the record of the two parties touching the particular subject matter of legislation being dealt with.

The Glass-Steagall bill, which we are now considering, is not an administration measure in the true sense of those words. It was not suggested by the administration, and its principles were actually opposed by the governor of the Federal Reserve Board and the Secretary of the Treasury until quite recently. Let me now submit the proof of that statement.

On December 12, 1930, Congressman SABATH, of Illinois, urged upon the governor of the Federal Reserve Board the expansion of the list of assets eligible for discount at Federal reserve banks, and declared such expansion could do no possible harm and would probably revive business and diminish unemployment. Those declarations by the Congressman were submitted in a letter directed to the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, Mr. Eugene Meyer, dated, as I have said, December 12, 1930. There was no reply to that letter until about three weeks had elapsed, when, on December 29, 1930, the governor of the Federal Reserve Board, who undoubtedly spoke for the administration, replied. I quote from his reply, as follows:

There are very few banks that do not have enough eligible paper to use at Federal reserve banks when the need arises. I am not inclined to believe, therefore, that enlarging the class of paper eligible for rediscount at reserve banks would help the credit or the business situation.

As late as January 19, 1931, Congressman SABATH insisted again to the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board that while there are many large banks possessing a surplus of rediscountable paper and therefore not in need of assistance, there are also other banks whose rediscountable paper has been depleted. He again urged broadening the classification as to eligible paper. There has never been a reply to that letter of January 19, 1931.

From time to time for more than 30 years Democrats in the Congress have proposed measures authorizing the issuance of emergency circulation based on United States bonds.

On February 6, 1900, Senator James K. Jones, chairman of the Democratic National Committee and Democratic leader in the Senate, proposed an amendment to the law authorizing an emergency circulation fund and the issuance of United States Treasury notes, secured by Government bonds, subject to redemption within 12 months. Note the close parallel between that provision and the one contained in the bill now under consideration.

January 4, 1932, Congressman KELLER, Democrat from Illinois, introduced H. R. 6720, giving the circulation privilege to all bonds of the United States.

January 22, 1932, he introduced a second measure, H. R. 8246, authorizing the issuance of Federal reserve notes based on Government bonds, with a view to stabilizing commodity prices.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] introduced S. 2675 on January 5, 1932, providing for an emergency circulation fund, the bill conforming substantially in terms to the proposal of Senator Jones, already referred to as having been introduced February 6, 1900.

Three weeks ago Mr. Mellon, who was then Secretary of the Treasury, and Mr. Mills, the present Secretary, emphatically and unqualifiedly disapproved these bills.

We all know the principal provisions of the pending bill have been modeled by the subcommittee of the Committee on Banking and Currency after paragraphs embraced in the Glass bill, S. 3215, the bill to which I referred some moments ago as providing for a somewhat general revision of the banking laws. This bill was introduced in the Senate January 21, 1932, but it has been in process of preparation by the subcommittee heretofore named throughout a period of one year or more. It is a general measure materially revising a large number of paragraphs in our present banking laws. It was, as already stated, prepared by a subcommittee of the Committee on Banking and Currency, of which the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] is chairman and the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT] is a member.

Of course, the important question is, Will the measure tend to restore confidence and expand credit; but it is also proper that the facts pertaining to the initiation of the bill shall be fairly stated.

This bill is receiving, as did the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill, practically the unanimous support of Members of the Senate. Every provision in it has been sponsored by Democrats, proposed by Democrats, at times when the administration or its spokesmen have expressed unqualified opposition to similar provisions. It can only be said to be an administration measure because of the fact that the administration is now according it support.

Yesterday in his able address to the Senate the Senator from Virginia pointed out the fact that there are almost $8,000,000,000 of assets acceptable under the law for discount at Federal reserve banks and that, in so far as the banks which own those assets are concerned, there is little occasion for the passage of this measure, because they have refused or failed to use the paper which they already possess, paper that is under present law available for discount. There are, of course, some banks, comparatively few, that have exhausted their paper which can be used for discount at Federal reserve banks and which are at present in need of the provisions of this bill, in need of the service that may be permitted under the terms of the bill; but it can not be said with any degree of soundness or fairness that the suspension of business, the failure of banks to make loans is primarily due to the lack of paper which the law permits to be discounted at the Federal reserve banks. It is due to the fact that the spirit of fear has possessed the souls of both depositors and bankers.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Arkansas yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Certainly that state of fear ought not longer to exist, because the newspapers yesterday carried the announcement that out of the $1,200,000,000 which 10 days ago the President said were hoarded he had induced $34,000,000 of it to come out into the open.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Well, Mr. President, it is not possible by holding public meetings and urging hoarders to abandon their practice to remove the cause which has prompted it. It is only natural when banks have failed in every part of the country that persons should resort to hoarding, and they will continue to do so in spite of all the eloquent utterances that may be made until they feel that their funds are reasonably secure in banks, and when that feeling shall have been brought about the moneys that are now being hoarded will go back into use, go back into circulation. If this bill shall accomplish that end, in whole or in part, it will be well justified, and there will be credit enough for all.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. I agree entirely with what the Senator said; and, as a member of the Committee on Banking and Currency and as a Member of this body, I am supporting the measure in the hope that it will accomplish that very thing. But does not the Senator think that fundamentally something must be done more than to allow somebody to borrow some more money before the real seat of all our economic difficulties will be reached and cured?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Undoubtedly. I do not think any business can be made profitable and prosperous by the sole process of borrowing money. If it were possible to accomplish that end in that way many who are in difficulty would be rich now, for they have borrowed to the limit of their ability.

Mr. President, as a part of my remarks I desire to have printed in the RECORD the amendment referred to, offered by former Senator Jones of Arkansas; also House bill 6720, introduced by Representative KELLER; House bill 8246, introduced by Representative KELLER; and Senate bill 2675, introduced by Senator WALSH of Massachusetts.

There being no objection, the bills and amendment were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. Jones, of Arkansas, to the bill (H. R. 1) to define and fix the standard of value, to maintain the parity of all forms of money issued or coined by the United States, and for other purposes, viz: On page —, line —, insert the following:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to have printed and to keep on hand United States Treasury notes under a special account, to be called the 'emergency circulation fund.' Such notes shall be full legal tender. Any citizen of the United States shall have the right to deposit United States bonds, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and receive from such fund 90 per cent of the face value of such bonds in United States Treasury notes, and shall have the right at any time within 12 months to redeem such bonds by repaying in United States Treasury notes the amount so received by him on account of such bonds, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent per annum on such amount. Failure to so redeem such bonds within the limit of 12 months shall operate as a forfeiture of such bonds to the United States, and such bonds shall be sold to the highest bidder in the open market, and the balance, after the payment of the principal of the amount advanced, the interest on the same, and the expenses, shall be paid to the former owner of such bonds. Any moneys received from such sale may be exchanged with other moneys in the Treasury, so that this fund shall consist alone of Treasury notes. The principal of all sums so advanced when repaid shall be returned to the 'emergency circulation fund,' and all interest upon such sums shall be passed to the credit of the Treasury under miscellaneous receipts. The actual amount of notes held in the 'emergency circulation fund' shall never be less than $50,000,000 in excess of any outstanding advances. Said fund shall neither be increased or diminished except in the manner provided."

A bill (H. R. 6720) to provide that for certain purposes under the Federal reserve act all United States bonds shall bear the circulation privilege

Be it enacted, etc., That paragraph 8 of section 4 of the Federal reserve act, as amended (U. S. C., title 12, sec. 341), is amended by adding at the end thereof the following: "All bonds of the United States, regardless of the time of issue, and regardless of any other provisions of law to the contrary, shall, for the purposes of this paragraph, bear the circulation privilege."

A bill (H. R. 8246) to amend the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, to stabilize the average wholesale price of commodities at the average level of the year 1926, thereby to correct the price decline suffered since September, 1928, to promote economic justice, to steady industry, agriculture, commerce, and employment, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That the act approved December 23, 1913, known as the Federal reserve act, as amended, be further amended by adding after section 14 thereof the following:

"SEC. 14A. It is hereby declared to be a leading purpose of the monetary policy of the United States to stabilize the average wholesale price of commodities in the United States substantially at the average level of the year 1926 according to the revised index of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, in order thereby to rectify the price decline suffered since September, 1928, to promote economic justice, and to steady industry, agriculture, commerce, and employment. The Federal Reserve Board and the Federal reserve banks are directed to conduct all their operations in subordination to, and in support of, this policy, and diligently to use their power over the supply of money and credit toward speedy restoration in the United States of the average wholesale commodity price level of the year 1926, indicated by the figure 100.00 in said revised index, toward prevention thereafter of deviations from said level exceeding 1 per cent, and toward prompt rectification of any deviations that may occur.

"SEC. 14B. For the purpose of enabling the Federal Reserve Board and the Federal reserve banks more effectively to carry out the provisions of section 14A hereof, the Federal Reserve Board is hereby empowered and directed, whenever it shall become necessary for the attainment of the objects specified in section 14A hereof—

"1. To authorize and direct any of the Federal reserve agents to accept from their Federal reserve banks, respectively, United States Government securities as collateral for the issue of Federal reserve notes, in amounts from time to time to be specified.

"2. To direct the Federal reserve banks, or any of them, to purchase United States Government securities in amounts to be specified in the orders, either from the United States Treasury or in the open market, and to hold said bonds, except as used for collateral under the preceding paragraph, subject to the orders of the Federal Reserve Board."

A bill (S. 2675) providing for an emergency circulation fund, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to have printed and to keep on hand United States Treasury notes under a special account to be called the "emergency circulation fund." Such notes shall be in the same denominations as the Treasury notes issued to the Federal reserve agents. Any bank, corporation, or citizen of the United States shall have the right to deposit United States bonds in the amount of $1,000 or multiples thereof, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and to receive from such fund 90 per cent of the face value of such bonds in United States Treasury notes, and shall have the right at any time within 12 months to redeem such bonds by repaying in United States currency the amount so received by him on account of such bonds, with interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum on such amount. Failure to redeem such bonds within the limit of 12 months shall operate as a forfeiture of such bonds to the United States. Any moneys received from such sale may be exchanged with other moneys in the Treasury so that this fund shall consist alone of such Treasury notes. The principal of all sums so advanced when repaid shall be returned to the "emergency circulation fund," and all interest and profits upon such advances shall be passed to the credit of the Treasury under miscellaneous receipts. The actual amount of notes held in the "emergency circulation fund" shall never be less than $100,000,000 in excess of any outstanding advances. Said fund shall neither be increased nor diminished except in the manner provided.

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts to the bill (S. 2675) providing for an emergency circulation fund, and for other purposes, viz:

On page 1, line 8, preceding the word "Any," insert a new clause, as follows: "Whenever and as long as the average wholesale price of commodities in the United States, as indicated by the revised index of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, stands below the level indicated by the figure 95.00 in said index."

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. President, I do not think the banking system of the United States produced the present widespread depression in our country; but I do think that its weaknesses and breakdowns have tremendously augmented our difficulties.

I feel very confident that the banking and currency system of this country upon the whole is so defective that we are less able to bear the present distressed condition of all industry, agriculture, and business in our country than we would be if we had a practical working banking and currency system.

Bob Burdette, I believe it was, said that no logician had been great enough to make a "convincing argument in favor of a failure or against a success." However the depression may have been caused, the banking and currency system of this country is prostrate, and we all know it.

In the month of January we had 334 bank failures in the United States, and in the year ending December 31, 1931, we had 2,290 out of the 20,000 banks in the country. We so generally recognized the utter breakdown of credit accommodation that almost with unanimity, forgetting party, forgetting section, we enacted into law the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill. Why? Because it was necessary to set up some instrumentality of government to carry the country through this crisis other than the worthless banking and currency system under which we have been struggling.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. MORRISON. I do.

Mr. KING. I apologize for interrupting the able Senator from North Carolina. I beg, however, with his permission, to dissent from the generalization in which he has indulged. I think we have the best banking system in the world, notwithstanding the prostrate condition of industry to which he has referred. I think it is attributable rather to the folly of the people in their persistent efforts to borrow, until we have contracted obligations amounting to nearly $200,000,000,000, rather than to defects in the banking system.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. President, I did not yield to the Senator to have a present debate with him, but for a question. If the banking system was not a failure, why did we set up an emergency contrivance for the very purpose of supplying the reasonable accommodations to the people of this country which the banking and currency system did not and could not provide? We have enacted other emergency legislation here; and to-day in a wide part of this Republic the only way the farmers are getting any money upon which to make their current crop is by direct loans from the Government through the Agricultural Department. Why? Because they can not obtain reasonable and current accommodations from the banking and currency system of this country.

Mr. President, I do not want to criticize bankers. I think every group engaged in industry or business in this Republic, on the whole, is worthy of this enlightened day; that there are good people in all groups, and there are bad; but in all groups the majority, I think, are good. While I would not say that some bankers have not abused the power which they enjoy under the banking and currency laws of this Republic, I do say, as a representative of a State where bankers as a class are as honorable and patriotic citizens as can be found in any State, that we ought not to use language here calculated to inflame the public mind against any worthy group of the people of our Republic.

At the same time, while I entertain a high opinion of the bankers of this country, if I had the genius and the moral power and dignity of the great Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] or the great Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], instead of lauding the system, I would erect a black shaft of infamy in front of the system as a whole, because in the hour of our country's distress—I shall not digress to discuss the primary and basic causes which, in my opinion, produced that distress—but when it came the banking and currency system of this country was totally inadequate to carry the people through the difficulty. I submit that weaknesses have been disclosed; and without any sort of claim to expert knowledge or profound learning upon the intricacies and mysteries of the banking and currency laws, they have been disclosed to me, as to millions of my countrymen; and I think this country ought to acknowledge the difficulties and remedy them.

Why, Mr. President, what is the matter with the banking and currency system of the country that all of this distress has occurred? You may talk about the banks being left with paper eligible for discount; but I have seen my friends, honored by me through a lifetime, with broken hearts, crazy, dying. Some of them have committed suicide. Wreck, misery, wretchedness exist throughout this entire Republic. What are we to do about it?

The Bourbon would say, "All's well"; but the liberal, the Democrat, the real Republican, and certainly the Progressive, ought to seek the weaknesses and remove them. The principal one is that under our banking and currency system no provision is made for rediscount by banks except of a few types of credit.

I am willing to grant the importance of the few types of paper eligible for discount; but we can have autocracy in financial legislation as well as other legislation. I do not believe, in democratic America, in having aristocratic, autocratic superiority in the items of credit provided for under the banking and currency laws of this Republic.

What are these preferred credits under the Federal reserve system—and I am willing to say that I think it is the best thing in the worthless banking and currency system, and about the only thing that is any account—what does it undertake to do? It does not loan money, as is generally thought. It discounts notes for the members of the system. What notes—any of them? No—oh, no! It discounts certain notes therein distinctly enumerated, and none other.

What are they? I shall not take your time, although they could be mentioned very briefly, to recall the enumeration. I think they have been embraced quite completely under the expression "for business in process"—short-term paper arising out of commercial transactions, manufacturing and agriculture, and all business enterprises where liquidity is provided for by the turnover in the transaction. For that purpose the Federal reserve system has been a success, I think, beyond the visions of the great financial statesmen who initiated it and contributed it to the banking and currency system of our country.

The effect of that success, however, has been that the very appreciation of that type of credit has depreciated every other type of credit known to the people of this country, with the result that while during this terrible trouble the paper subject to rediscount moved under all the circumstances I think reasonably generously and well, yet the banks which belong to the regional banking system do not loan money on that type of credit alone. They do, and have to do, almost everywhere, a general banking business, with the result that in some sections there is little of the type of paper eligible for discount; in other sections more; but there is a lack of other credit in this terrible crucifixion of the small man. I do not like to use that term, because I am no demagogue, and my brethren in the Senate will find it out if I serve here long enough.

The average man, the small man who finds himself dealing with a deficit instead of business in process, has not been adequately provided for. The great commercial transaction, where the responsibility is high, has very little difficulty in getting the short-term money provided for in the Federal reserve note-discounting system—very little trouble; but every other type of credit has been practically destroyed, as is a matter of common knowledge.

Mr. President, we are cited to the number of banks which have some paper subject to rediscount. I would not want to say anything to encourage the banks not to go ahead, and I am not an admirer of the ignoble attribute of the human heart called cowardice. I admire prudence, discretion, not cowardice, and frequently the bravest man is the man who exercises sound discretion.

I submit that in the main these banks which have this paper subject to rediscount understand that under present emergencies, with thousands of depositors lining up daily in front of the banks all over this Republic demanding their money, they would better keep that paper, because next to cash it is the best thing a bank can have, because it can be rediscounted quickly and the depositors' demands met, while all other types of credit are worthless in this emergency for lack of rediscount opportunity.

Banks have broken, markets have broken, lives have been wrecked and families made miserable, and whole communities blighted by banks failing, with good municipals, with the highest class of securities known to the business life heretofore, in hand, for lack of anywhere to go to get reasonable discounts upon which to continue their business.

Mr. President, this banking and currency system, it seems to me, has a weakness there which could be safely removed. This bill does what? It is a further recognition of the very difficulty I have tried to point out, and which all the business world understands. The emergency reconstruction finance bill was a recognition of it, powerful and sweeping and unprecedented.

This bill does what? For the first time the regional banking system provides for actually lending distressed member banks some money, not discounting particular types of notes, but lending them some money upon the security therein mentioned, with the safeguards therein provided, in an emergency, and gentlemen seem to be afraid, say it is terribly dangerous and fraught with all sorts of danger.

Mr. President, I do not expect it to be done now; I know that we victims of the system can not overcome yet the experts and those who have the mysterious knowledge of this subject; but I dare say the time is not far distant when this will be made, with proper safeguards, a permanent part of the Federal reserve system of this Republic.

We have had warning in this catastrophe, instead of resorting to this emergency legislation, that something like this provision of the bill ought to be made permanent and everlasting. The system is actually dangerous without it, because under it we take all this gold that the United States Government has acquired, which it has through this particular bank, and we use it for mankind as gold has not heretofore been used. No. We use it to bolster up this aristocratic, autocratic type of credit in this country, and none other, and we use only a little for that. We lock the rest up and worship it, but do not use it, while our country and the world are suffering because there is so little gold that we can hardly do the business of the world with it any way.

If his satanic majesty had employed his greatest genius upon this earth to do something to distress mankind, I do not think he could have done a thing that would have caused more suffering to the producers, to the creators of our commodities of all types and kinds, than to have taken the large part of the gold of the world we have taken and locked it up, dedicated a portion of it to particular types of credit, and locked the rest up and denied all mankind its use. That has been a powerful contributing cause, in my judgment, to the deflated, paralyzed condition of every industry in this Republic in which men toil, either with hand, back, or brain.

We provide through this measure for a little loan to the bank, a small discount, hedged about, tied up, but in a great emergency rather than let the country be completely destroyed and mankind truly crucified, they are willing to exercise the rediscount power a little bit upon the whole assets of the bank with good security.

I think it goes a very little way, but, thank God, it moves; it moves in the direction of liberalism and of compassionate regard for the whole people in their demand for a credit system under which the people, even in time of adversity, can hope to find their savings safe in the banks of the country, and obtain such reasonable credit accommodations as they may be able to amply secure.

Mr. President, I have not anything to do with the official conduct of a bank, but I am somewhat acquainted with the operations of banks. I know one in a splendid city of the South, one of the cities that is probably nearer synonymous with industry, initiative, and success along many lines than any other town of the whole Southland.

One of the banks of that town broke, as banks were breaking everywhere in the vicinity. There was consternation. The other banks were threatened. What did the officials of the bank I refer to do? They went to the Federal reserve bank with all the paper they had subject to rediscount, and had it approved for discount, and made ready, so that if the depositors lined up in front of the bank as they did in front of two others, and demanded their money, they could use this paper—and it was all they had—to obtain the cash with which to pay their depositors. They held that paper, and I say it would be cruel to demand of those men, in the condition in which they are now, that they rediscount that paper. Why should they? Is there any evidence here that this type of loan has been refused? No; verily there is not. Such loans have not been refused over the country generally, because paper which can be rediscounted is looked upon practically as money.

Before we can criticize a bank, we must understand its difficulties and the danger in which it may find itself; and danger will be imminent, in my judgment, throughout the country, and certainly throughout the South, for some time unless we pass this bill.

This bill, Mr. President, it is said, will do away with fear. I beg leave in perfect sincerity, and with tolerance for those who disagree with me, to modify that statement by saying that it will do away with the reason that has made as brave men as honor the business life of this Republic live in daily dread and horror not only of their banks being wrecked but, if they are wrecked, of finding themselves in the penitentiary for permitting it to happen, as most of them, without regard to the merit of the case, are apt to be accused of doing amid the excitement and bitterness general throughout the land.

This bill will to a degree let these banks understand that they may rediscount their eligible paper, and then do what with it? If a farmer did not make any money last year, under the Federal reserve act he may borrow some money with which to make his crop this year if his paper is good. But what good will that do him when the sheriff is going to sell him out for what he lost last year before he can make his crop, as they are doing all over the country? Yet they can not borrow a cent and can not rediscount anything except notes with which to carry on business in agriculture in process.

Under this bill, if it shall be enacted, they can rediscount his paper with greater safety than they could before, and after they have discounted it they can loan it to somebody else besides the aristocrats of American finance who desire the particular items and types of credit provided for in the Federal reserve rediscount powers.

If the Federal reserve system of this country is accepted by the country as an example of how successfully this thing can be done, it will forever bless the people of the Nation and of the world because our influence will radiate all over the world. It has demonstrated that by taking the people dealing in that kind of credit, tying them together under safeguards erected, as Mr. Warburg called it in one of his early speeches on the subject, into a "reservoir of credit" to which in time of fear and disaster they can resort for accommodation. If that is the purpose of its creation, it has gloriously succeeded, and it has demonstrated to the public that we can succeed, with supplements and additions to it that will carry the blessings of that great idea to every business and every nook and every corner of this Republic.

But if it is to be set up as a completed "sacred cow" and worshiped, without lessons to be learned from it, without amendments, it will prove a curse, in my judgment, to the people of America. Let us imitate it. Let us take the whole business of the Republic and under wise, well-considered safeguards mobilize the assets of all of the banking and currency system of the country and put up additional reservoirs or enlarge this one, in order that resort may be had there for other purposes than for discount of three or four months' paper arising out of commercial transactions and contracts to carry on business in process. Let us but profit by it and utilize it, and it will bless this Republic as no other measure enacted into law in our day has blessed America. It has demonstrated its success, but it has also been as clearly demonstrated that it does not embrace enough of our total business life, and that with safety more can be embraced.

I am for the measure before us, Mr. President, because for a year we are going to enjoy its blessings—a whole long year. Why a year? Why not let us try to be happy and out from under this distress, not produced by the banking and currency system but which we have to live through—why not let us hope for two years of greater ease and opportunity to live and do business? Why not let us hope for a long life of a sound banking system based upon the Federal reserve system and our experience with it?

Yes, Mr. President; the country is in a bad fix. The great burdens upon this country and upon the world, I think, are three in number: First, destructive, confiscatory, business-paralyzing taxation all over the world, and reckless, improvident expenditures by the United States following the war and its mighty outgo, which the people could not bear. Our own war debt we are paying too fast, and with these other burdens the country is suffering. Then we continued to raise the tariff and raised it until finally we enacted the last great monstrosity which caused the whole world to flame into resentment, and to resort to the same isolation, the same commercial inactivity. We practically paralyzed trade in the world by our tariff. That has been, with taxation, a powerful contributing cause to present conditions.

Then, Mr. President, the money of a majority of the people who live in the world is cheaper money than ours. It is depreciated money compared to ours. There is nowhere in the world, hardly, that we can do business without a disadvantage on account of the fact that they will pay us more in their money, in some places four times as much, as they would in our money. When we sell cotton to the eastern man at 7 cents he will have to pay us from 22 to 28 cents for it, and that has contributed to paralyzing foreign commerce. We are not able to do the normal business through which we dispose of our surpluses.

All that has brought about this terrible condition and found us with a banking and currency system under which we can not bear as easily as we ought to be able to bear this terrible condition.

The condition will never be remedied by any of the legislation we are enacting. We must cut down public expenditures and taxation and restore life to the industries so that men who are now out of employment will find jobs. To do this we must in some way reestablish trade with the world, moderate the tariff troubles under which we suffer, and in some way finally we must get our money and the world's money in some shape under which we can do business in competition with other countries who are using a cheaper money, and do business direct with other lands without their having to pay destructive prices in exchange.

In the meantime, Mr. President, we have in the United States now still standing, many of them paralyzed and dead and with cause to be frightened, 20,000 banks. Only about 7,000 of them belong to the Federal reserve system. The others must trust for rediscount opportunities to those who do belong to it. When they have the right paper they can discount it. I believe that this measure when enacted into law will be a healthy tonic to the whole business life of the Republic. Where will it do any harm? I do not think anybody seriously claims it will do any harm. It certainly will not. Some are very much afraid that the country will think it will do more good than it will really do. I would hate for that to happen because of inflation; but, Mr. President, for a moment more I want to say that the depreciated value of everything in this Republic has become a most serious question.

Some talk about raising taxes this year in the higher income brackets. I shall not oppose it, but I want to point to the fact that there will be very few in these brackets as compared with the past. Whoever paid the highest income taxes last year not only did not make any money in the sense of net increases in his wealth but he lost more money than anybody else in the country. The man who paid an income tax on an income of half a million dollars last year derived from the ordinary assortment of American investments suffered a depreciation in the value of the property from which the income came greatly exceeding the income, I should say, on an average of five times as much. In the sense of taxing people who are making more money now, there are none, because the man who received an income last year of $6 on a share of stock worth $125 in the beginning of the year has seen that stock depreciate until now it is worth only $27 or $30, as, for instance, New York Central Railroad stock. We may tell him until we are black in the face that he made money last year, but he knows very well that he did not. Even if he keeps that stock, the value is gone, and thousands are having to sell such investments at heavy losses.

Mr. President, what the country needs to realize is that there has been depreciation in all values until there is no net increase in anybody's wealth. It is all very well to put taxation on those whose wealth is mounting annually by the millions on the cash items involved in income, but when it is going the other way and when as a matter of fact they are losing millions and millions, as some of them are, it is a different proposition. I do not think we need to be worried if this legislation should have the effect of bringing back to somewhere in the neighborhood of their real worth the farms, the town lots, the shares of stock in the great enterprises of the Republic, and thus to increase the wealth and the power of the great business fabric of the Republic.

Oh, but, it is said, Mr. President, that it is very dangerous, that inflation is a terrible thing—and it would be; but I do not think anybody need be afraid of ultimately getting back into the whole life of the Republic a credit system under which we will attain to normalcy, much less inflation. It is going to be a long, tedious struggle in my opinion. Ten per cent of the banks are gone. It is going to take a long time and the finest kind of statesmanship and business ability that ever led this country to get us back to our normal state where the whole people can be doing business in a healthy way as they did before this great depression came upon our country and, led by our country, upon the world.

Mr. VANDENBERG obtained the floor.

Mr. McNARY. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, the recommendations in behalf of this measure which were submitted yesterday by the able and distinguished Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], who, without question, is the highest congressional authority upon legislation of this character, are entirely sufficient to defend, first, its necessity, and secondly, its dependability in respect to the sound operation of the Federal reserve system. I had hoped the legislation might proceed to a vote without further discussion upon the basis of the thoroughly illuminating presentation submitted by the Senator from Virginia and by his able colleague the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT]. But the debate has taken a wider and more critical range in many respects, and I am begging the indulgence of the Senate for a few incidental observations which, it seems to me, are highly pertinent to the contemplated legislation.

Undoubtedly there is nothing to be gained by further discussion of the condition of member banks in the Federal reserve system or by a further discussion of the exhibits upon this floor as submitted by the Senator from Virginia yesterday in respect to eligibility assets. Yet there are certain implications which ought to be reanalyzed. It requires no assurance of mine, Mr. President, that the figures submitted by the Senator from Virginia are accurate. But the interpretation to which those figures may be subject is a matter of appropriate discussion, and in respect to a practical survey of these figures I find myself in different conclusion from my able friend. His thesis was that this new rediscount privilege may not be needed because of resources already existing. My thesis is that the new privilege is a decided necessity and a great potential utility.

Even this much of a further discussion of the figures might be a disservice at the present time, except that, in my judgment, it wholly helps to sustain the importance and the necessity of the pending legislation. I believe it to be the most useful and potential contribution which can be made to economic restabilization for the advantage of our whole people.

The Senator from Virginia submitted figures indicating that only 91 member banks of the Federal reserve system have exhausted their eligibility resources. As I have already said, that is a scrupulously correct statement. But it reflects the condition as of September 29, 1931, and to-day's condition, due to hysteria now happily and justifiedly stopping, is a totally different story.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. The Senator from Virginia did not, I think, refer to it, and I do not know that the figures are available; but I am wondering what proportion of the national banks that have failed and closed their doors during the last year or two had exhausted their eligible rediscountable paper.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I am unable to give the Senator the figures. Possibly the Senator from Virginia can answer the question.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I may say to the Senator from Kentucky that I endeavored to get that information from the comptroller's office yesterday, but was told that it was not now available; that they had no statistical information on the subject. I also endeavored to ascertain the causes of bank failures within a given period, notably bank failures which have occurred since September 29 of last year, the date of the issuance of the last quarterly report, and was told by the comptroller's office that there were no such statistics available, and doubt was expressed as to whether any such information could be obtained. My desire was to ascertain whether banks had failed because of a lack of eligible paper or whether they had failed because of improvident extensions or other maladministration; but there were no such statistics available.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, possibly the conclusions to which I am about to proceed will bear upon the question which the Senator from Kentucky has propounded.

Mr. BARKLEY. It occurred to me, just in that connection, that the mere statement that there are only 91 banks now in operation among those that are still left that have exhausted their rediscountable paper would not afford a true picture of the banking situation, because most of those that have closed within the last two years might have exhausted their rediscountable paper, and that might have contributed very largely to their inability further to function.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I completely agree with the Senator, and I am proceeding to discuss, so far as information is available, the question to which the Senator adverts.

We are discussing the fact that on September 29, 1931, which was nearly half a year ago, there were only 91 banks in the Federal reserve system, which presumably had exhausted their eligible resources at the Federal reserve banks. Even at that time, Mr. President, 20.6 per cent of those banks had less than $10 of eligible assets per hundred dollars of their total loans and investments. In other words, one-fifth of them were under even a decent margin in respect to their rediscount assets. Mind you, they had other equally good assets, but these other sound values fell outside the arbitrary limitations set up in the original Federal reserve act some 15 years ago. Commercial practice has changed in these 15 years, and Federal reserve definitions should progress with the times.

Let us carry the analysis farther. The fact is that 231 banks reported upon that date—and their figures are included in the total to which the Senator from Virginia referred—231 banks reported that they were using 70 per cent or more of their eligible assets to borrow from the Federal reserve banks at that time. They were in the danger zone. Meanwhile, since September 29, 1931, the deposits in the Federal reserve banks of the country have declined two and one-fourth billion dollars, or 11 per cent, so that in the interim between September 29, 1931, and the present hour, which we are treating in respect to this legislation, there has, of course, developed an obviously tenser situation. We must treat it as we find it. There is an emphatic and tangible need to be met.

Furthermore, I want to use a specific exhibit to demonstrate the fact that we might be misled in our interpretation if we did not break down the figures to which I am adverting.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. ROBINSON of Indiana in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Oklahoma.

Mr. GORE. The Senator observed that the deposits in the Federal reserve banks had declined more than $2,000,000,000 since the September report. Did he mean the Federal reserve banks or the member banks?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I meant, of course, the member banks of the Federal reserve system.

There was one Federal reserve district, Mr. President—which, perhaps, for the purpose of this further discussion had better not be identified—in which the report of September 29, 1931, indicated that only five banks had exhausted their eligible resources. That obviously is an astounding and challenging statement and would indicate a total lack of any need for supplemental relief. Furthermore, I repeat, it is an absolutely accurate fact, as submitted by the Senator from Virginia——

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Yes. I think I could present my collective picture a little better if I might be interrogated at the end instead of in the middle, however.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am sorry. I just wanted to interrupt at that point to suggest that people withdraw their deposits not only from the member banks but from the State banks and the banks generally. This falling off of deposits, which would seem to emphasize the importance of this measure, is one of the reasons why the banks fail to utilize their eligible paper. It is because they know that the deposits are diminishing and they want to be prepared to respond to the demand of depositors at any time; and for that reason they are not using all of their eligible paper. Is not that the case?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I totally agree with the Senator from Florida.

Now let me proceed with this particular exhibit. As an indication that ample rediscount eligibility already exists we are given this example: Here is a Federal reserve district in which it is reported that only five member banks have exhausted all of their eligible paper as of September 29, 1931; yet in that district 103 member banks closed in 1931, and 25 more have closed since New Year's—a total of 128 banks in that particular district which have closed in 14 months, leaving 870 open. In other words, 1 out of 7 member banks in that district have closed in the course of 14 months. One out of seven member banks in the district have exhausted not only all of their eligibility but all of their other ability to keep their doors open. So the fact that five banks only are reported upon a given date as having exhausted these resources, I submit, does not wholly represent, although it has its bearing, the question of whether or not the eligibility privilege, as now existing and as heretofore existing, is entirely adequate. I state also my belief that many closed banks would be open to-day if a broader rediscount privilege had existed, because some closed not by reason of insolvency but by reason of a lack of abnormal liquidity.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. I am sure the Senator from Michigan will concede that the degree in which his analysis of the figures may be accepted would depend upon the question as to how many of those failed banks failed by reason, as I have said, of improvident extensions of loans to their own officials which never should have been made, of investments in immobile securities, and of general mismanagement of the banks.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I cordially agree with the Senator that none of these figures can be read to a final conclusion. That is precisely the point I am making; and it applies equally to those I am submitting as it does to those that were submitted by the Senator from Virginia.

Bearing upon the question of whether or not the remaining eligibility is badly distributed, it is illuminating in passing to note that in the particular district to which I am now adverting I am apprised as of to-day that 60 per cent of all of the rediscounts in that district are confined in half of one State; so that in the half of that one State there is a totally different situation than there is in the rest of the area. So here, again, we find the impossibility of reading the abstract statistics to a fully conclusive opinion respecting the utility of the existing rediscount privilege. In other words, it is my contention that abstract figures, as of last September, pretending to show a large amount of unused rediscount eligibility are not an automatic argument against the need for or the propriety of this legislation.

For instance, here is a typical example, Mr. President. I am quoting from a letter from the chairman of the board of directors of what is still one of the soundest banks in America, in a typical progressive American city of 50,000 people:

> Commercial paper is on the market only in a limited degree as compared with 1914. In this city we have about $38,000,000 of sound banking resources and less than $2,500,000 worth of paper that is legally subject to rediscount at the Federal reserve bank. The theory is that other paper is not marketable. As a banker of 43 years' experience, I am not interested in these theories. I am interested in securing money, and securing it quickly, in case of an emergency. The Federal reserve system is wonderful in many ways; but as a direct support in this, the greatest financial emergency in history, it has failed.

I do not agree that it has failed; but I do agree, Mr. President, that it can and should and must safely serve a larger measure of emergency dependability in precisely the fashion that is proposed in this legislation because the other assets referred to in this letter are often just as good or better than the eligibile assets under the existing rule. The existing rule is prejudicial and unwarranted. It reflects upon banking assets that may be the best in the land.

I agree that there has been definite and specific hoarding in some of the larger banks of the United States, and I think a very serious indictment can be laid at their door in some serious instances. Yes; and I agree, Mr. President, that there has been a speculative element in the portfolio of many of these banks—an element which deserves every stricture that the distinguished Senator from Virginia has pronounced upon them, which deserves every corrective element which he can fabricate in the measure which has yet to come before the Senate under his auspices. I cordially concur in his point of view in this respect. I think that when the fact is disclosed that upon a given day the total brokers' loans in a handful of Federal reserve member banks exceeded by three-fourths of a billion dollars all of the mortgages upon all of the farms and upon all of the homes of the United States, it is a tragic contemplation in respect to the nature of our fiscal and banking operations.

I agree that there has been in some instances also a certain type of inexcusable banking timidity; but, Mr. President, I cringe at the word "cowardice" that has been used in the indictment of the bankers of America as a whole, as it was used in many newspaper reports this morning in connection with the disclosures made yesterday upon this floor.

Edmund Burke said that you can not indict a people. Neither can you indict a class. It is true, of course, that there has been cowardly banking; but in my own observation I have seen many and many and many an epic in heroism and self-sacrifice and total dedication to the community welfare in big and little banks of the United States during the last tragic months. Let us be no less free with these acknowledgments than we are with our criticisms and complaints.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield to the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. If it will not divert the Senator, I think at this point it might be suggested that over and above the $3,000,000,000 of commercial paper reported at the time given in the portfolios of the member banks of the Federal reserve system, there might have been many millions more had certain dominating influences in the Federal reserve system undertaken to create an active market for commercial paper, instead of practically confining their open-market operations to bonds for stock speculative uses.

Mr. VANDENBERG. In that comment, Mr. President, I totally concur, and I associate myself with the Senator in his attitude respecting them.

The chief reason why I rose was to add whatever reassurance may be necessary—I think none is necessary—to the credentials which support this legislation. The fact that the able Senator from Virginia puts his recommendation behind it is of itself a major warrant; but I make bold to submit, Mr. President, further very definite indications of the opinion in America that precisely this type of banking emergency relief is calculated to be of vital advantage to our credit and currency situation, to our bank depositors and borrowers, to the maintenance of our gold standards against all raids, to a stimulated commodity-price index, to resurgent trade, and thus to reemployment.

I want to submit the reactions of the State banking commissioners of the United States. It may be something of an anomaly and a paradox to consult State banking authorities in respect to a national-banking instrumentality. Nevertheless, the fact remains that the State banking authorities are in intimate contact with their own local situations. They are in intimate knowledge—at least, they should be—of the nature of the banking problem as it impends in the various States.

With this thought in mind, I undertook last summer and fall, when I was studying this same problem, to determine what the reaction of State banking authorities would be toward precisely the type of legislation which now impends, undertaking to accumulate this information as a background for what ultimately came to be Senate bill 546 and Senate bill 547, the forerunners of this legislation, which I introduced at the beginning of the session, and which were heard by the Committee on Banking and Currency last December.

This is the question which I asked these various State banking commissioners last September. I asked them whether they would favor the following proposition:

> The creation of a limited emergency power akin to the so-called "Lombard loans" made by every central bank of issue in Europe.

That is a very important fact, the fact that these so-called emergency loan privileges exist in some form or other, and have for a century, in connection with practically every central bank of issue in Europe.

> The creation of a limited emergency power permitting the temporary rediscount of "other assets"—

Other assets being those beyond the limited definition in the Federal reserve act itself—> subject to the discretion of the board of directors of the Federal reserve bank and to such restrictions, limitations, and regulations and special rates as may be imposed by the Federal reserve bank, provided that these emergency rediscounts shall not be used as collateral security for Federal reserve notes.

Mr. President, it seems to me that the result of this referendum should be highly encouraging to any Senators who may still have any lingering doubts either about the utility or the safety or the high encouragement in the pending legislation, because here is definite official information straight from the decentralized banking control points of the Union.

What was the result of this questionnaire, a questionnaire which was circulated at almost precisely the time which is reflected in the rediscount figures which we have been discussing? This was last September. Affirmative replies, often accompanied by enthusiastic and urgent letters, were immediately recorded to this question from the following States: Alabama, Arizona, Connecticut, Delaware, Florida, Georgia, Illinois, Indiana, Iowa, Massachusetts, Michigan, Mississippi, Missouri, Nebraska, Nevada, New Mexico, Oklahoma, Oregon, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, South Dakota, Tennessee, Texas, Utah, Vermont, Washington, Wisconsin, and Wyoming.

Mr. President, thus 28 States, in the face of circumstances as they existed last fall, were asking for this new latitude which is provided in the pending measure. There were others whose affirmative response was in general terms. A few were opposed. I have attempted, during the past few days, to bring the poll down to date in the light of subsequent developments. Additional affirmative indorsements as a result may be recorded from the following States: New York, North Dakota, New Jersey, Arkansas, Maine, Rhode Island, Maryland, California, Montana, and Idaho.

This, Mr. President, makes a total of 38 States which, speaking through their State banking authorities, put themselves squarely upon record in definite and specific indorsement of this pending philosophy of fiscal action and of the advantage to be gained from the creation of this protective emergency machinery in the Federal reserve system.

The following States expressed themselves in general approval of careful liberalization, without wanting to be specific: Kansas and Virginia.

The only States registered in opposition on the poll of last September, from which I have not been able to secure subsequent word, were New Hampshire, Minnesota, and North Carolina.

Mr. President, with that background of official banking credentials, not from bankers but from the duly chargeable public banking authorities of various States, I turn to one or two other exhibits by way of a demonstration of the broad base which underlies and justifies the acceptance by the Senate of this legislation which makes a better Federal reserve system, a safer system, and a system more responsive to the developing needs of the United States.

I want to refer to a statement issued on January 7, 1932, by the American Farm Bureau Federation, which produced an amazingly complete analysis of the relations between money, prices, and prosperity. It showed that the dollar's buying power to-day makes it worth $1.45 compared with normal, and that the commodity-price index has sunk below par in relative proportion. With the price index at 100 for 1926, the general commodity index in November, 1931, was 68, and the agricultural-ocommodity index was 58. Here we touch the realities of our troubles.

The American Farm Bureau Federation came to these two conclusions, these findings being the conclusions which the federation believes essential if we are to restore our economic normalcy:

> First. Restore the wholesale commodity price level to a point somewhere near that at the beginning of the present deflation.
> Second. Stabilize the price level at that point.

How to achieve these results, in the view of the American Farm Bureau Federation? The third of the recommendations reads as follows:

> Broaden the rediscount-eligibility provisions of the Federal reserve act.

In other words, these economists, speaking for organized agriculture, come to the conclusion that the use of a conservative broadening of the rediscount eligibility of the Federal reserve system will make its contribution toward the return of the commodity-price index toward par. When that trend sets in, Mr. President, we have broken the vicious circle which now has us in its grip. We have turned toward the economic sunrise.

In precise line with this conclusion, let me also refer to the well-known program of economic action proposed during the holidays by a group of distinguished economists, headed by Prof. Warren M. Persons, formerly of Harvard, and including all of the following distinguished experts: Prof. T. S. Adams, of Yale, member of the fiscal committee of the League of Nations; Prof. E. L. Bogart, University of Illinois, retiring president of the American Economics Association; Prof. T. N. Carver, Harvard, president of the American Economics Association; Prof. J. M. Clark, Columbia; Prof. John R. Commons, University of Wisconsin; Prof. John H. Cover, University of Chicago; Victor Clerk, consultant in economics, Library of Congress, former editor of Living Age; Prof. J. S. Davis, director of Food Institute, Stanford; Prof. Carroll W. Doten, Massachusetts Institute of Technology; E. Dana Durand, former director of the United States Census; Prof. J. T. Ebersole, Harvard Graduate School of Business, former economist, United States Treasury Department; Prof. Irving Fisher, Yale; David Friday, Washington economist; Prof. Jacob H. Hollander, Johns Hopkins University; Virgil Jordan, economist, McGraw-Hill publications; Prof. Edwin W. Kemmerer, Princeton, monetary consultant to several governments; Max O. Lorenz, statistician, Interstate Commerce Commission; Prof. Harry E. Miller, Brown University; Prof. Harold L. Reed, Cornell; the Rev. John A. Ryan, Catholic University, Washington; Prof. I. Leo Sharfman, University of Michigan; Prof. Walter Spahr, New York University; Prof. Walter E. Willcox, Cornell, vice president, Institute Internationale de Statistique.

What was the diagnosis of these leading economists of the country? First, that the general contraction of credit and the deflation of prices had gone far enough. A thousand times, yes.

Second. That the United States "can have substantial business recovery without waiting for a solution of Europe's difficulties."

That is a highly encouraging and refreshing thing to be said, and a thing which ought to be said. We can, if we will, be self-sufficient.

Third. That recovery is possible on a sound money basis, "without recourse to monetary panaceas."

This is a philosophy with which I cordially associate myself. In the measure pending before the Senate there is no panacea, and there is not a penny of anything else except sound money; and I, for one, would not approach one inch in the direction of anything else but sound money. The program pending has in it only the same kind of money precisely which exists in America to-day, and a limited creation of a thoroughly safeguarded provision for latitude, as emergency arises and as necessity may dictate. We unlace our strait-jacket.

Let me pursue the analysis from these distinguished economists by way of leading to a demonstration that here again is the same meeting of minds at the point where the Senate to-day is invited to action upon this legislation.

How did these economists suggest that these desirable results should be accomplished?

First, pass the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill. That has already been done.

Second, force economy in municipal, State, and National budgets, and increase taxation to meet any remaining deficit.

This second plan is well under way, so far, at least, as the Federal Government's prospectus is concerned.

Third, build a liberal Federal reserve policy designed to check credit contraction and encourage some expansion.

Thus again we arrive at the same indispensable goal. Once more we reach the precise measure now pending before the Senate.

Mr. President, these exhibits could be multiplied almost without end. It is the considered opinion, I believe, of those in America who think they know something about the question that this measure which the Senator from Virginia brings to the bar of the Senate to-day has within it the greatest possibilities of encouragement, and then of actual contribution to a restoration of reasonably dependable economic times, of any legislation which has been offiered or will be. I favor it enthusiastically, and I should favor a still further release of some of the limitations in it.

Of course, the question of inflation immediately arises, the bogy question of inflation. There is a school of thought at home and abroad which can not approach the question of inflation, or hear the word, without apoplexy. Inflation, as it is known abroad, means printing-press money, the type of money which, if the world has ever needed an unanswerable demonstration of its futility, got the demonstration in connection with the French assignats of 1790. Of course, there is no inflation of any such type involved in this measure.

If it were to mean debased currency, it would most certainly be entitled to precisely the same quarantine as would printing-press money. If it represented fiat money in any degree, of course, it could not earn the consideration of a favoring Senate. But none of these elements is involved. In no remote degree are any of these elements involved, and those who seek to attribute any of these elements in any degree to the pending legislation are either ignorant or malicious.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Wisconsin?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. BLAINE. I hope that after I ask a question of the Senator he will not consider me malicious, at least.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I acquit the Senator in advance.

Mr. BLAINE. I may be ignorant of what this bill purports to do, but I want to call the Senator's attention to the fact that when United States obligations, which are merely promises to pay, are used as eligible paper against which the Federal reserve system may issue Federal reserve notes up to the extent of 60 per cent of that promise to pay, have we not, to that extent, a scrip money that has no other backing than the promise of the Government, the same as a Government note would be a promise of the Government to that degree, 60 per cent?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, under the terms of the bill, the substitution of Government bonds in that sector of the note backing which requires something else than gold would seem to me to provide the finest and most dependable security on earth, and to that extent it would seem to me that Federal reserve circulation issued upon the basis indicated would be even sounder circulation than that which is issued under the existing method.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield further?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Certainly.

Mr. BLAINE. Has the Senator answered my question? My question is this: Government obligations are merely agreements to pay. So to the extent of 60 per cent back of the reserve notes is an obligation of the Government to pay. Are not the notes therefore to that degree—that is, 60 per cent—merely paper money, a promise to pay, having no other force and effect than a printed dollar which carries on the face of it the statement that "this is equal to 60 cents"? We have nothing but the promise of the Government to pay. We have exactly the same situation when the Government issues scrip money, when it issues greenbacks, if you please. To that degree it is money that is nothing more than the ordinary scrip.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. I am sure the Senator from Michigan does not need any aid from me; but, if I may, I take leave to suggest that there is something more behind the note than the promise of the Government to pay. In addition to that promise of the Government to pay, the combined assets of 12 Federal-reserve banks, with the double liability involved of the member banks, are behind the note.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I thank the Senator for his contribution.

Mr. BLAINE. That prompts this further question. If we could determine the ratio of that double liability to the amount that can be issued under the terms of the bill against Government obligations, then to that degree we still have the element of scrip or the greenback—to some degree at least. I do not know what degree it might be. On the face of it the degree of the scrip is exactly 60 cents on the dollar if the Federal reserve issues notes with 40 per cent gold and the remainder Government obligations.

Mr. GLASS. I am not finding fault with the soundness of the Senator's view. I think his view is sound. But right on that point I may state that it has been suggested that there should be some limitation upon the amount of United States securities that may be used for the purposes indicated. In short, it has been suggested that the Federal reserve banks be confined to the $750,000,000, which they have bought and now have on hand. But that is a question which we may consider when we take up the bill section by section.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, I happen to be one of those who believe, speaking very bluntly, that one of the necessities of the moment is more money. I do not mean to be facetious, for that is obviously the need. I am speaking of more currency. One of the best authorities I know of in North America upon subjects of this nature is Mr. T. B. McCauley, president of the Sun Life Insurance Co. of Canada, from whom I quote the following:

> That the purchasing power of currency depends on the amount of that currency and currency credits which may be outstanding can no longer be denied.

I do not think it can be denied. I have a feeling that the contraction of the volume of our currency is one of the major difficulties which we confront in driving back toward normalcy, not only because of its effect upon banking but particularly because of its effect upon trade. We can not do normal business with a subnormal currency. What is it we are undertaking to do when we fight hoarding? We are undertaking to bring back more money, more sound money, more real money into being and into circulation. What is it that will primarily make the largest contribution toward starting the commodity price index back up out of the basement? More money, more actual, real money, more currency. The volume of the currency, the sufficiency of the currency, is inevitably related to the commodity-price index, and the commodity-price index is inevitably related to the moment when we shall dependably start back toward prosperity in our economic operations. I do not mean this is a cure-all, but I do mean that it is permanent and priceless tonic.

So that the phase of the bill which contributes to more sound money in terms of currency is a phase of the bill which in my humble judgment is calculated to make a substantial contribution to the advantage of the next few months, and this is just as great a contribution to labor as to capital. It is a contribution to business and to jobs.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. In view of the rather wide discretionary power which is lodged in the Federal Reserve Board, how much more money does the Senator think this will provide?

Mr. VANDENBERG. The Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] responded yesterday to a question along similar lines indicating that in his judgment a maximum of $1,500,000,000 of additional currency could issue under the terms of the bill. I will submit to the Senator from Idaho a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Ogden L. Mills, dated February 16, 1932, which states:

> The total volume of Federal reserve notes that the Federal reserve banks can issue is limited by the requirement that a 40 per cent gold reserve must be maintained against such notes. On the basis of the existing volume of excess reserves, which is $1,400,000,000, the Federal reserve banks can issue $3,500,000,000 of Federal reserve notes. There is nothing in the pending bill to change this maximum amount.

The thing that is in the pending bill is a provision which defeats the present sterility of the gold supply. A definite answer to the Senator's question would be entirely dependent upon a definite identification of the extent of our free gold. The mere existence of the new latitudes may well so restore confidence and restore money from hiding that their actual use might not be largely necessary.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Regardless of the maximum amount that may be issued by the Federal reserve banks, will not the amount that will be actually issued depend somewhat on the demand for money, and will not that demand depend upon the confidence men will have in the investment of that money for business or economic purposes, so that fundamentally we have to restore somebody's confidence in the ability to get a return on the money before they are going to borrow it for any purpose?

Mr. VANDENBERG. That, of course, is entirely correct. It is what I am saying. I agree with the Senator's statement.

At this point I ask that the letter of the Secretary of the Treasury, from which I just quoted, may be printed in full in connection with these observations.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD,
Washington, February 16, 1932.

Hon. ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR VANDENBERG: I wish to acknowledge receipt of your letter of February 12, in which you inquire about the effects of section 3 of the pending bill, S. 3616, on the power of the Federal reserve banks to issue currency.

The total volume of Federal reserve notes that the Federal reserve banks can issue is limited by the requirement that a 40 per cent gold reserve must be maintained against such notes. On the basis of the existing volume of excess reserves, which is $1,400,000,000, the Federal reserve banks can issue $3,500,000,000 of Federal reserve notes. There is nothing in the pending bill to change this maximum amount.

Under existing law, however, the Federal reserve banks will be able to meet only about $430,000,000 of additional demands for currency (or for gold for export) without making it necessary for member banks to increase their indebtedness at the reserve banks. This is for the reason that the law requires that Federal reserve notes issued by the Federal reserve agents be covered up to 100 per cent either by eligible paper or by gold. At the present time the total amount of eligible paper in the hands of the Federal reserve banks is about $900,000,000 and the total amount of Federal reserve notes outstanding is $2,900,000,000, so that about $2,000,000,000 of the Federal reserve notes have to be covered by gold. When allowance is made for the 35 per cent reserve required against deposits and for the amount of gold required in the redemption fund in the Treasury, this leaves about $430,000,000 of gold that is not required either as reserve or as collateral against notes. It is only up to this amount that the reserve banks can meet either an internal or an external drain without forcing the member banks further into debt. When this amount of free gold is distributed among the 12 Federal reserve banks, it is clear that the available margin is narrow. It is evident that it would be highly undesirable in the existing circumstances, with member-bank indebtedness already over $800,000,000, to increase this indebtedness, particularly so long as this increase is not caused by a revival of business but either by further domestic hoarding or by gold exports. It is in order to meet this situation that the proposed amendment authorizes the Federal reserve banks to use United States Government obligations as collateral against Federal reserve notes. This will make it possible for the reserve banks to meet additional demands upon them without putting member banks further into debt and thus exerting a contracting influence on the credit situation.

At the present time every effort must be made to encourage banks to resume the normal financing of the requirements of trade and industry, and the necessity of increasing their burden of indebtedness must be avoided. It is for these reasons that I urge the adoption of the section in S. 3616 which authorizes the use of direct obligations of the United States as collateral against Federal reserve notes.

Very truly yours,

OGDEN L. MILLS,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, some people call this bill "antideflationary," seeking to avoid the awful word "inflation." Some describe it as "a privilege of expansion," still seeking to avoid the word "inflation." Personally I am not afraid of words, and I decline to be crucified on their definition. But I am not sure that if a scrupulously accurate word were to be sought to describe the process which is invoked, it would be neither "deflation" nor "inflation," but "reflation," suggesting in the nature of the word itself that we are simply seeking to recapture the normal and essential currency supply in emergency, so far as that can be done on an absolutely safe and appropriate basis.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Oklahoma?

Mr. VANDENBERG. Certainly.

Mr. GORE. I would like to have the Senator's views and criticism on this point. I was reading an address a few days ago by Doctor Kemmerer, of Princeton University, a recognized authority on the subject of banking and currency. He stated that on October 31, 1929, the week of the crash, there was in circulation in this country $4,838,000,000; that on the 30th day of November, 1931, two years later, the circulation was increased to $5,536,000,000. There was an increase of $700,000,000 in our monetary circulation—in our coin and currency—an increase of 14 per cent. During the same two years trade and production had declined in the country 25 per cent, and in addition to that the wholesale price level had declined 30 per cent; so that taking the amount of money in circulation on October 31, 1929, as related to trade and production and as related to price level, there was the equivalent of $2.20 in circulation on November 30, 1931, as compared with $1 in circulation on October 31, 1929, the week of the crash. Counting the amount of work to be performed by our monetary circulation, there was a potential increase in our volume of coin and currency amounting to more than 120 per cent. I would like to have the Senator's comment on that point, because to me it is a very interesting problem.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I agree with the Senator that the statement is exceedingly interesting. I would not assume to analyze it in detail without having the figures in hand to study. I would say at the moment that the figures involve one fiction, namely, that the so-called circulation in the fall of 1931 to which the Senator adverts was circulation in theory rather than in fact, because of the tremendous hoarding which already was under way and because of the tremendous amount of assets which were locked up in the closed banks of the Nation. The mathematical equation which he submits to me is an equation which is more seeming than real. Nevertheless, there is a challenge in the figures and one that deserves study.

Mr. GORE. The Senator is correct in that observation, and that is the point I was trying to make, whether the cause of the existing trouble is a shrinkage in money or not. If that is not the reason, of course we may be pursuing a phantom. If it is the reason, of course it ought to be ascertained beyond doubt, because we do not wish to administer treatment based upon an incorrect analysis or diagnosis of the disease. That is the reason why I interrupted the Senator.

Mr. VANDENBERG. I thank the Senator. As I have already indicated, I am one of those who believe the volume of currency does have some relationship to the problem.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Florida?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. FLETCHER. Is it not true that perhaps it is not sound to refer to this money as being in circulation when as a matter of fact it may not be in circulation; that is to say, the money that is hoarded is listed as in fact in circulation, whereas it is not in circulation actually at all.

Mr. VANDENBERG. That is correct, and that is what I have undertaken to show.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, adverting to the suggestion of the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] that we might be treating the patient for the wrong disease, I have not been so certain that in some of our legislative treatments here we have not proceeded on the policy of the quack doctor who was called in to diagnose the disease of a member of a family. After stumbling around considerably and deciding that he did not know what was the matter with the patient, he suggested to the family that he was good on fits, and therefore he would throw the patient into a fit in order that he might cure that. I am not so certain that in some of our governmental actions in this country we have not thrown our own country, if not the world, into a fit, and that we are now undertaking to cure that in order we may establish a reputation as physicians.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, allow me to agree with the Senator to this extent, that, in my judgment, the pending measure should have been the first measure in the program of reconstruction; and, in my judgment, if this measure had first put its authority into the reactions of the Nation 60 days ago, some of the other instrumentalities which we have created might not have been necessary. The President, in his admirable December message, used a happy phrase when he asked us to join him in putting steel beams under the Nation's credit structure. We have been setting these steel beams in place one by one. But this is the greatest steel girder of all. I thought so last summer when few would listen. I think so more emphatically than ever to-day.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Michigan yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. VANDENBERG. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. In discussing this question with particular reference to having paper which is now not eligible made eligible for rediscount, after the astounding presentation of the facts by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] on yesterday, I was wondering if the innumerable failures of banks, particularly country banks and those in the outlying districts, had not been due to the fact that the price of agricultural products of the country has shrunk to such a point that in seasonal times when ordinarily deposits are made by those who have borrowed for the purpose of producing their crops there have been withdrawn from the banks what little deposits remained over, because the gross returns did not in any degree meet the cost of production. In two major crops alone in two years, 1930 and 1931, there was a drop from the preceding year of something over $4,000,000,000 in value of farm products. That meant that that much actual currency was lost to trade which otherwise would have made it possible for the banks to have tided over the period when their deposits were so depleted, and therefore they could not continue in business.

What I am wondering is, will the plan that we have before us now, if adopted, have any effect in the way of restoring confidence on the part of the banks throughout the country so that they will lend on the basic agricultural elements? I say, Mr. President, here and now, that until real estate and agricultural crops are restored to something like a fair price—that is, a price covering the cost of production of such crops plus a reasonable profit—there can be no relief from the present situation in which we find ourselves.

I am wondering if the proposition now before us, by releasing paper that is not otherwise eligible but will be made eligible, will cause the banks to lend any more liberally or freely on real estate or on farm products than they now do.

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, it is my judgment that this measure has the largest possible assurance in it for a complete reestablishment of confidence not only in the people themselves in respect to the banks but in the banks themselves in respect to their own resources and with respect to their relationship not only to their depositors but also to their borrowers.

I ask not to be further interrupted, Mr. President, for just a few moments, while I conclude what I have to say, for I have occupied the floor far longer than I anticipated.

On the question of inflation, which I was discussing when diverted, I simply want to conclude with this very trite editorial observation from the Iron Age, a very important trade publication of the Nation, of the issue of December 17, 1931:

> Transforming a rout into an orderly retreat can not be called an advance. Checking unbridled deflation to prevent it from leading to economic disaster can not be called inflation. Yet if this be inflation, make the most of it.

I cordially associate myself with that observation and that conclusion. And finally, Mr. President, I also associate myself with the observation of the Secretary of the Treasury, testifying before the House committee recently in connection with this measure, speaking as follows:

> This is the most constructive piece of banking legislation introduced in either House of Congress in many a year.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD immediately following the very interesting address of the Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] an address recently delivered by Dr. Arthur B. Adams, who is professor of economics in the University of Oklahoma. He is a recognized authority on this question and has written two works on the subject of business cycles. The address which I ask to have printed in the RECORD is a very thoroughgoing analysis of the causes which have brought about the present depression. He expresses some doubt as to the effectiveness of the pending measure. I think the address ought to be made part of the record so that both sides may be considered. Doctor Adams contends that overtrading, speculation, and overexpansion of credit have characterized every depression we have had in this country; that we have suffered from an overexpansion of credit. He insists that the measure now pending, while it may prove a temporary palliative, may lead to a return and to an aggravation of existing evils in the future. Without expressing any opinion as to the correctness of his conclusions or his remedy, I should like to have his address inserted in the RECORD.

It is a matter of importance that we should not mistake symptoms for causes. It is a matter of even greater importance that we should not treat the symptoms as if they were causes, and it is a matter of the greatest importance that we should not ignorantly, though innocently, intensify the causes of prevailing distress instead of removing or counteracting those causes.

If, indeed, we had been upon an economic debauch or had been the victims of an economic delirium, it might conceivably be, as suggested by Doctor Adams, that an excess of credit might not be the cure for an excess of credit, or for the evils resulting from such an excess or delirium.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

The address of Doctor Adams is as follows:

PROBLEMS OF THE DEPRESSION

(Delivered before the American Association of University Women at Shawnee, Okla., by Arthur B. Adams, February 1, 1932)

Barring a war of large magnitude, recovery from this business depression is likely to be so slow that it will be imperceptible from month to month. A big war might temporarily stop the depression but a war which would stop the depression would in no way cure the fundamental economic and business difficulties which underlie the depression. War would only produce an inflational condition which would result in further intensifying the fundamental economic problems which must be solved in order to cure this depression.

In my opinion, the fundamental forces which brought about the present depression in the United States are as follows:

1. The technological progress made by the United States from 1900 to 1929 brought about a rapid increase in mass production, lowered the cost of production, and decreased the number of laborers employed per unit of product produced. This great increase in production was stimulated by the World War and the war was largely responsible for the enormous favorable balance of trade which the United States has had since 1915. However, the war was not the prime cause of our technological development. This development was due to inventions and was an inevitable result of our factory system, our industrial combinations, and our large natural resources. The war, and conditions after the war, only made the technological progress more rapid than it would have been otherwise.

2. The $11,000,000,000 loan of the Federal Government to the allies during and immediately after the war made possible the enormous favorable balance of trade which in turn stimulated our technological progress from 1915 to 1920. The eight to ten billion dollar private loans which have been made through American bankers to foreign governments and foreign citizens has supported our large favorable balance of trade since 1921. This huge favorable balance of trade gave a market for a large part of the surplus goods which Amercia was producing.

3. From 1922 to 1929 a relatively stable price level was maintained in the United States under conditions of a decreasing cost of production and a comparatively stable wage level. This decrease in cost of production, increase in output, and stable prices enormously increased profits during this period. There was a corresponding decrease in the power of consumers to purchase the goods which we were producing. This increase in profits acted to stimulate overproduction in many industries.

4. As a result of the World War we increased our gold supply enormously, and as a result of the passage of the Federal reserve act we developed a strong banking system. After the crisis of 1920 (from 1922 to 1929) credit was quite easy in the United States, and as a result of this situation we used an excessive amount of bank credit in speculating in urban real estate and securities, both domestic and foreign. This brought about the stock-market boom which terminated in 1929.

5. During the period of 1923 to 1929 (the Coolidge boom) American business enterprises produced and sold goods at a total value greatly in excess of the total current money income of the American consumers. At this period of time American consumers purchased large quantities of goods on installment purchases; they also bought many goods with paper profits made on stock-exchange speculation. From 1915 to 1929 we exported in excess of imports about $32,000,000,000 worth of goods. From 1923 to 1929 outstanding installment purchases increased from somewhere around $1,000,000,000 to about $8,000,000,000. There were many billions of dollars of paper profit made and spent as a result of the stock-market boom from 1924 to 1929. The favorable balance of trade, the increase in installment sales, and the expenditure of paper profits took from 15 to 20 per cent of American goods from the market with purchasing power other than the consumers' current money income. Foreign sales, supported by foreign loans, installment sales, and the expenditure of paper profits were highly artificial sources of purchasing power for goods.

In 1929 these artificial props to the market for American goods were destroyed and the Hoover depression of 1929 occurred. At that time the banks had used so much credit on the stock-market boom that the Federal Reserve Board called a halt in the use of further bank credit in speculation. Foreign loans, because of shortage of domestic funds, decreased, our foreign-trade balance fell off, the stock market broke, paper profits were swept away, goods began to accumulate in the market, prices fell, industries were closed down, unemployment increased, and the depression was on. Since that time we have had the financial crisis in Germany, the fall of the gold standard in England, and the spread of the depression to every civilized country in the world.

This depression did not originate in any of the European countries. It was brought about by conditions in Europe only to the extent to which we were unable to make further loans to European countries to support our favorable balance of trade which was built upon unsound loans which we had already made in those countries. The following verse from a current issue of the Saturday Evening Post illustrates the fallacies of our reasoning in reference to international loans and foreign trade:

"INTERNATIONAL FINANCE

"If anybody owes you money
And can not pay, be bright and sunny
And let him borrow more and more
To pay you what he owed before.
Oh, never let base fear betray you!
Unless you lend, how can he pay you?
But if you always lend and lend,
Prosperity will never end.
Because the more you lend a debtor
And help to make his credit better,
The better he can borrow, which Is wherefore we are all so rich."

We can not continue to make additional large loans to Germany or to any foreign country on the theory that by so doing we will save the loans which we have already made. Neither can we expect to continue to maintain the large foreign-trade balance which we have had for the past 15 years. During this time our trade balance has been supported almost entirely by the loans we have made. The countries to which we have been selling the goods have been unable or unwilling to pay for the goods from their own resources.

America must adjust itself to a balanced trade or to an unfavorable balance of trade. Also, in the future we must not depend upon selling more and more goods to American consumers on installment payments. Certainly in the near future the American consumers will not be able to buy a large quantity of goods from stock-exchange speculation profits. The only basis upon which American business can recover is that the goods which are produced and sold will be purchased by American consumers from their current money incomes. In other words, we must depend upon the home market and see that the American consumers have sufficient current money income with which to purchase the goods which are produced.

In order for the American consumers to keep American industries operating it will be necessary to increase the consumers' money incomes in relation to the goods which are produced. In plain language, real wages must be higher and profits must be lower in the United States if industry is to operate at anything like a normal capacity. This increase in real wages may be brought about by the lowering of prices without a corresponding lowering of wage rates. In a large measure this has been done already, and to this extent a fundamental necessary adjustment has been made. In making the adjustment between consumers' real income and value of goods produced it is going to be necessary to reduce the hours of labor of workers in order to furnish jobs for more workers.

HOOVER RELIEF MEASURES

The Hoover financial relief recommendations, if enacted into law, would not cure any fundamental economic difficulties. It is not likely that the prices of commodities would be raised as a result of their enactment into law, and neither is it likely that the price of securities would be raised materially. The trend of world prices in terms of gold-standard money is downward. The increase of domestic credit will have little influence in this trend.

Prices of securities must depend ultimately upon the earning power of the concerns which issued the securities, and the Hoover relief measures would not, to any considerable extent, increase the earning power of business concerns.

By purchasing the frozen assets of banks the Reconstruction Finance Corporation may give some relief to communities where banks have already failed or to communities where the banks are about to fall. This measure undoubtedly will decrease the blood pressure of a good many bankers, both large and small, who are in financial difficulties. To no considerable extent will it furnish a market for the goods of American industries or increase the money income of American consumers.

The increase in the capitalization of the Federal land banks undoubtedly was necessary to maintain the value of their bonds in the market, and probably a few farmers will get financial relief as a result of this measure.

Thanks to the real statesmanship of Senator CARTER GLASS, the Senate has refused to accept Mr. Hoover's recommendation "to liberalize" the Federal reserve system by making the paper of the Reconstruction Corporation rediscountable at the Federal reserve banks. Such a measure would have greatly weakened the strength of the Federal reserve banks.

Mr. Hoover's policy seems to be to supply more credit to bankers so that they will supply more credit to farmers and business men in order that they in turn may stimulate business. The fundamental difficulty in the United States is not the lack of credit; one of the fundamental difficulties is that too much credit has been used already. The fundamental difficulty is a lack of an adequate market for the goods we are able to produce. This market must come largely from increasing the real income of American consumers. This can be done by writing off capital losses and accepting lower profit margins; to accomplish this we must have lower prices or higher wages.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma obtained the floor.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. GEORGE. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Copeland	Hull	Reed
Austin	Costigan	Johnson	Robinson, Ark.
Bailey	Couzens	Jones	Robinson, Ind.
Bankhead	Cutting	Kean	Schall
Barbour	Dale	Kendrick	Sheppard
Barkley	Davis	Keyes	Shipstead
Bingham	Dickinson	King	Smith
Black	Dill	La Follette	Smoot
Blaine	Fess	Logan	Steiwer
Borah	Fletcher	McGill	Stephens
Bratton	Frazier	McKellar	Thomas, Idaho
Brookhart	George	McNary	Thomas, Okla.
Broussard	Glass	Morrison	Townsend
Bulkley	Goldsborough	Moses	Trammell
Bulow	Gore	Neely	Vandenberg
Byrnes	Hale	Norbeck	Wagner
Capper	Harrison	Norris	Walcott
Caraway	Hastings	Nye	Walsh, Mass.
Carey	Hatfield	Oddie	Watson
Connally	Hawes	Patterson	Wheeler
Coolidge	Hayden	Pittman	White

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-four Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, on yesterday I introduced an amendment which was printed and is now upon the table. I call that amendment from the table and ask that it be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senator from Oklahoma offers the following amendment:

On page 3, line 15, strike out the following:

for a period of not exceeding one year.

On page 3, line 16, change the first letter to a capital "F."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. May the Chair state, before the Senator from Oklahoma proceeds, that there are certain committee amendments which must be disposed of first. The Chair understands that the Senator wishes to address the Senate regarding his amendment, and not to offer it now.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I desire to address myself to the amendment.

Mr. President, I should like to have the attention of the members of the subcommittee, if I may. I should like to ask the subcommittee, or the Senator who speaks for the subcommittee, whether or not this amendment striking out the limitation for one year can be accepted.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I think I can speak for the subcommittee to the extent of saying that it will not be accepted.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, it is somewhat embarrassing for me to argue in favor of an amendment that is not agreed to by my distinguished colleague from Virginia. I have always followed his lead in matters of finance.

I well remember when he led the fight in favor of the present financial structure. I was not a Member of the Congress at that time. I happened to be in Washington when the bill was passed, and I saw the measure signed. That measure, the Federal reserve act, in substance at least, will be the law for ages, and so long as it shall last the name of the distinguished Senator from Virginia will be indelibly attached to it.

Of course, in the passage of that act the Senate had an important part; and at that time a distinguished Senator represented Oklahoma in this body. He was then the chairman of the Banking and Currency Committee and in Oklahoma, as in Virginia, we take particular pride in referring to the Federal reserve act as the Glass-Owen bill. Therefore, when the distinguished Senator from Virginia objects to an amendment which I propose, I am loath to proceed.

But, Mr. President, this is a most important proposal—as important and far-reaching as any pending before the Congress. It has to do with banks, money, and credits, and affects directly industry, transportation, agriculture, labor, and more vitally perhaps that great American industry of politics. Because of the transcending importance of the measure and because it contains one provision which should, in my judgment, be eliminated, I have offered an amendment, and my responsibility as a Senator compels me to present my views to the Senate.

As I shall proceed I welcome questions. If I misstate a fact, I want Senators who are cognizant of such misstatement to call my attention to the error. This invitation includes the distinguished junior Senator from Virginia.

I have been taught to believe that the Senator from Virginia would be the last one to sponsor this sort of legislation. On legislative proposals, and especially on financial legislation, the Senator from Virginia is sound. If I might be permitted to criticize him slightly, I would say that he is a little too sound when it comes to the money question. On the basis of a relative comparison a gold dollar beside the distinguished and able Senator would actually appear hollow. On the proposal advanced, when I shall have concluded, I will be content to rest the case upon the judgment of this Senate. I invite the attention of the Senators who represent agricultural constituencies, Senators who represent labor constituencies, and most particularly I invite the attention of the Senators upon this side of the aisle.

Mr. President, the fact that I find myself in opposition to the distinguished junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] forces me to state at some length the reasons why I have offered this amendment. Let me suggest a question to my friends upon this side of the aisle. Why has the administration always opposed this legislation until now, on the eve of a national political contest? When the bill becomes a law the administration will flood the country with money, commodity prices will rise, and the stock exchanges will boom. What will be the effect upon the country? If the effect will be favorable, then why limit such a boom to one year?

Mr. President, unless the 1-year limitation is stricken, the bill should not be enacted.

The purpose of the bill as stated in its title is:

To improve the facilities of the Federal Reserve system for the service of commerce, industry, and agriculture, to provide means for meeting the needs of member banks in exceptional circumstances, and for other purposes.

Section 2 proposes to improve such facilities "for a period of not exceeding one year," and it is this limitation that I am seeking to strike from the bill.

Mr. President, I am not a member of the committee. I am not a banker. I do not live in a large city. I do not even live in a county seat. I do not live on paved, parked streets, among the bright lights. I live 15 miles from the nearest bank. I live at Medicine Park in the midst of one of the mountain ranges in my State. I live at a point where I can look in one direction and see the hills and valleys of the Fort Sill military reservation, and almost daily I can hear the booming of distant cannon. I can look in another direction and see the mountain peaks and valleys of the Wichita National Forest, and on and around those mountains I can see buffalo and elk and deer and turkey. At the base of the tallest peak—Mount Scott—we have a placid, limpid lake filled with fighting bass.

At nighttime I am lulled to sleep by the hoot owl, the whippoorwill, an occasional coyote, and a waterfall. In the morning, if it be in the summer, I am awakened by the robin and the mocking bird. If it be in the winter, I am awakened by the swish of ducks coming in, and the honk of geese passing over.

Mr. President, with such a background it is somewhat presumptuous, I admit, for me to take issue with the distinguished Senator from Virginia.

In brief, this is an inflationary measure. It proposes, if it proposes anything, to put money in circulation. The bill was introduced by the distinguished junior Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS]. He likewise reported the bill for passage, and the report states that the measure should not be "used for undue inflation." This would indicate that the author of the bill favors inflation of our currency, and that to such extent he is an inflationist.

On yesterday he made the statement that we have some wild inflationists in the country. Perhaps I am one of those coming within this category; but he being a mild inflationist, and I being a wild inflationist, the difference is only a matter of degrees.

Mr. President, if this bill passes, section 2 will be operative only for a year. I made the statement a while ago that the Senator from Virginia was really against this bill and all its provisions. He always has been against such liberal financial legislation, and he is now yielding only for a year. In a moment I will read from an article that I think will be of interest. I have often heard it said that legislation sometimes contains jokers. Without attaching any offensive meaning to the word "joker," I make the charge now that this bill contains a joker. It may, however, be a political joker.

If this bill means anything, it means that we are to have a vast flood of money placed in circulation shortly. I have been advised that some of the proponents of this legislation asked that it be made a law for 90 days only. "Give us this liberalization for 90 days; then the law can cease to exist." Well, we know how the camel gets under the tent. He gets his nose under first, and eventually the camel is under. The Senator from Virginia knows how slowly the laws operate. He knows that 90 days would be of no practical benefit; and at the instance of those sponsoring this legislation the distinguished Senator from Virginia yielded for a year. In my judgment, the bill should be made permanent law if it is to be enacted.

Mr. President, before I proceed further, I state that I am for the bill provided this limitation is omitted, and it is the burden of my efforts to show why the 1-year limitation should be stricken out.

This bill proposes to put money in circulation. What effect will that have? As money is placed in circulation, money becomes more plentiful; and as money becomes more plentiful, money becomes cheaper; and when money becomes cheaper commodity prices rise. That is what will happen, and I favor such a policy; and favoring the results which the act will bring about, I want the beneficial effects on business for more than a single year.

Senators coming from the interior and away from the great financial centers, in the opinion of some, should not be interested in finance, in money, and in credits. But it must not be forgotten that the great financial institutions and centers of the East live almost entirely off of the interior, southern and western States; and in the enactment of laws the citizens of Oklahoma, the farmers, wage earners, and business men are entitled to the same consideration as those who in the recent past have shaped and controlled the destinies of the Nation and who are responsible for the condition which makes necessary the kind of legislation embraced in the pending measure.

I am not charging that this is a political bill, or that it is being enacted on the eve of a political campaign. It is proposed as a relief measure, and I am wondering why it has been consistently opposed until now when the election is only a few months away. The bill provides for inflation of the currency and consequently higher commodity prices. Inflation, high prices, stimulation of business, the election, and then the law automatically dies and deflation and depression will be with us again.

Now, to the promised syndicated news story. I do not know why this article has apparently escaped the attention of my colleagues upon this side of the aisle. It is a peculiar coincidence that the article to which I refer was printed on February 7. Immediately upon its appearance a conference was called, and on the 11th, four days thereafter, this bill appeared.

The article is by Mark Sullivan, a distinguished writer, one whose productions are as widely read as are those of any publicist of America and perhaps the world. The story, dated February 7, is under the title:

Price level to guide candidates.

I call attention to some of the salient features in the article. I will not read it all. This is what Mr. Sullivan says:

The outcome of this year's presidential election and most of the other major events of this political year will be determined by—dreary phrase, but potent in every aspect of politics and business—the price level.

Before I read further, let me make a prophecy, dangerous as making prophecies is. The price level will be the paramount issue in the campaign to be waged between now and next November.

Further, Mr. Sullivan says:

That is, the price of commodities, wheat, cotton, copper, everything, including wages.

From price level everything in this year's politics starts. Price level will determine the platforms, whether there will be a powerful third party, and which and who will win the Presidency.

Compared to this one dominating influence, price level, all the commotion about candidates—

I omit the names of the candidates. They are not at this time material.

Price level is the primal cause of the political forces and passions of this political year. To understand price level is the A B C lesson of this year's politics.

Then Mr. Sullivan recites the effect upon the farmer of having the price level raised and the effect on the farmer of having the price level lowered.

Further on says Mr. Sullivan:

Relief of debtors by Congress can take one of two forms.

That is what we are trying to do. The Congress is trying to relieve the debtor class of this Nation. That is the issue before the Senate. We have just spent two weeks upon that proposition, and we are not through. We are trying to help the fellow who is in debt. Mr. Sullivan says that that is the issue in the campaign. He says:

Relief of debtors by Congress can take one of two forms:

Either (a) extension of debt or partial forgiveness of debt by legal moratorium or (b) increase in the quantity of currency, which will raise the price level; raise, among other commodities, 50-cent wheat to $1 wheat.

In Congress so far the attempt has been to enact moratoriums. When the bill for increasing the capital of Federal farm loan banks and the bill for the Emergency Reconstruction Corporation were before Congress some 30 attempts were made to add amendments providing for a moratorium on debts. The attempts, the impulse toward relief, came from Senators and Representatives of both parties and from every section and reflecting every business group.

That was a direct attempt at statutory relief of debtors by arrest of foreclosure. In the same spirit were some 30 others.

All these attempts failed. They failed, it is true, largely because Congress was in a hurry to enact the principal measures to which these amendments were attached. We may say that for the present Congress has shown a disposition not to relieve debtors in this particular way. But it is abundantly clear that Congress is determined to relieve debtors in some way and is under overwhelming pressure to relieve them.

Now for the other way. Mr. Sullivan says we have tried to relieve the debtor class through a moratorium. It has not been done, and he says it can not be done. Then the only alternative, according to Mr. Sullivan, is this:

The other way to relieve debtors is by raising the price level. The price level can be raised in several ways. The one that Congress is certain to attempt is by circulation—and, therefore, the quantity of credit.

Debtors can be relieved by raising the price level—for example, by raising wheat from 50 cents a bushel to $1 a bushel. The price level can be raised by increasing the quantity of currency in circulation among the people. Increasing the quantity of circulation is commonly called "inflation." In the present situation it ought not to be called "inflation." Accurately, it is rather a case of "stopping deflation." "Inflation" is a word leaving a bad name, because it is properly the term to describe increase of currency and credit at a time when there is already too much. What we have now is an extreme in the other direction—an extreme contraction, extreme deflation. And the purpose now is to arrest extreme deflation by increasing the quantity of currency and credit.

Says Mr. Sullivan:

Increase of currency (and credit) can be achieved by Congress in one of two ways:

(a) Increasing the quantity of currency which Federal reserve banks can pass out in exchange for commercial paper.

(b) Coining silver, in addition to gold and in a certain ratio to gold.

The attempt to increase currency through Federal reserve banks will be made first.

How prophetic!

If that fails, then we shall be face to face with a demand for coinage of silver. The demand for coinage of silver will appear in Congress; if it fails there, will appear in the presidential campaign. Coinage of silver as a political issue can only be forestalled by legislation to increase the quantity of currency through the Federal reserve banks.

I see some of my colleagues smiling. I wonder why. I read further:

To understand this it is necessary to understand, first, how currency is created by Federal reserve banks.

Any business man can take certain types of commercial paper to his bank. His bank, in turn, can take it to a Federal reserve bank and the Federal reserve bank will hand out the currency for it.

The kind of commercial paper that can thus be turned into currency is severely limited. A mortgage won't do. Henry Ford might give a mortgage for $1,000 secured by all the real estate he owns, but the Federal reserve bank under the present law will not give out currency for it.

The attempt in Congress will be to enlarge the kinds of commercial paper which can be exchanged for currency.

When I first read this story, and as I read it again, I can not but reflect on the source of inspiration for the article. I do not happen to have the honor and the pleasure of knowing Mr. Sullivan personally, but I am advised that he is quite intimate with the leaders of the administration. I understand that he knows what is going to be done before it happens. I understand that he is the propagandist for the party in power. I understand that he is the man in charge of the window dressing for legislation, and I submit this article as proof of the statement I am making.

I want to read that last sentence again:

The attempt in Congress will be to enlarge the kinds of commercial paper which can be exchanged for currency, which are, in the legal phrase, "eligible for rediscount privilege." When that attempt is made it will be resisted by some conservatives, though decidedly not all; many conservatives are strongly in favor of increasing currency by this means.

Here is a significant statement, and one which I can not understand:

The leader of the opposition—

That is, to inflation—

The leader of the opposition will probably be Senator CARTER GLASS.

I am quoting from Mr. Sullivan:

Senator GLASS was one of the authors of the Federal reserve system 16 years ago. He regards himself as the defender of his child.

Free silver is a western issue and if it should get into the platform would seem to call for a western candidate. Herein lies the long chance which, one suspects, may be inspiring Gov. "Alfalfa Bill" Murray, of Oklahoma, in his present peregrinations up and down the land.

This article appeared in the papers of the country on February 7, and on February 11 this bill made its appearance, and the bill follows very closely the terms and the tenor of the article coming from the inspired source to which I have alluded.

Mr. President, on one morning we see in the public press that we are to have some inflation of the currency, and we have a bill the following day proposing to inflate the currency, and when that is done stocks on the New York Exchange and on the commodity market begin to mount. Then two days later the papers come out with the statement that we are not to have inflation, and the stocks begin to go back down.

I call attention to some of these newspaper clippings. Just a few days ago the President gave out a White House statement on an antihoarding policy, and in the body of the statement I find this language:

Hoarded currency means that high-powered dollars are idle and that in turn means idle business, idle men, and depreciated prices.

The President tells the country that the lack of money means idleness and low prices, and that if something can be done to bring money out of hiding and restore it to activity, prices will increase. That is all inflation is, getting money from some source and putting it into circulation. So the President in this statement advised the country and the world that the way to help out prices and bring back prosperity was to place more money in circulation. Is not that inflation?

What is inflation? We heard a lucid interpretation a few moments ago by the distinguished junior Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG], and I agree with him.

The dictionary says that inflation means to swell, to expand, to puff up. The dictionary refers to a balloon as an example or illustration of what inflation might mean.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Does the dictionary explain or give any example of overinflation?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I will come to that in a moment if I may have the privilege.

Mr. President, all are familiar with balloons. I thought about getting a small sample to exhibit to the Senate. Then I decided it was not necessary. For a balloon to be efficient, it must have sufficient air or gas to make is serviceable. If it is deflated, it is useless, and if overinflated it explodes and is destroyed.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. SMITH. Would not a more appealing illustration about deflation and inflation be an automobile tire rather than a balloon? Would not a deflated tire and an inflated tire be a better illustration?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I thank the distinguished Senator from South Carolina and admit he has suggested a more familiar illustration.

A currency system should be sufficiently broad and sufficiently numerous in its units to permit the business of the country being transacted fully, efficiently, and honestly. If there is not sufficient money in circulation, the currency is deflated. If there is too much currency in circulation, the balloon explodes or the tire "blows out."

The distinguished and able senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD] suggested that it might be possible to have too much inflation. In recent times this has happened.

Let us take Italy for illustration. Before the World War Italy did not have very much money in circulation. The amount was 499,000,000 lire. Italy got into the war. She had to inflate her currency; she had to expand it; she had to puff up her financial balloon. When the war was over this nation found that it had 16,356,000,000 lire in circulation. Of course that was more money than the country needed. As a result Italy proceeded to cancel part of her money and to revalue the lire and the result was that the circulation was deflated at the same time the value of the unit was materially reduced.

What about France? In 1913 France had only 5,565,000,000 francs in circulation, but France likewise became involved in war. She had to expand her currency. She did not have the gold, so France had to do what the other nations did—expand and inflate her currency. After the war was over and in 1920 France found that she had 38,066,000,000 francs in circulation. In other words, her currency had expanded from 5,000,000,000 to 38,000,000,000 francs. Of course that is a very large expansion, but the inflated balloon did not burst; the tire did not blow out. Before the war the franc was worth 19 cents. France could not redeem some 38,000,000,000 francs based on gold. France had to revalue the franc, and when this was accomplished the French monetary unit was reduced in value from 19 cents to 3.91 cents. To-day the French franc is not worth a nickel. It is not worth even 4 cents, only 3.91 cents. That means that the holders of French securities, the owners of French deposits, and those who had their wealth in fixed investments lost almost four-fifths of their wealth.

Here are two illustrations where the financial balloon was expanded to the limit and yet the balloon did not explode.

Let me next call attention to Germany. When the war began Germany had only 1,999,000,000 marks in circulation. In order to finance her war Germany had to raise money, and inflation was resorted to. When the war was ended the circulation was vastly increased. If I can read the figures, I shall place them in the RECORD. The amount was 496,505,424,771,973,000,000 marks! It takes 21 figures to put on paper the number of marks that were in existence in Germany when the war was over. Of course, the German people could not pay that gigantic sum. There is an illustration where expansion and inflation went the limit. The bubble burst, the balloon exploded, the tire "blew out," and Germany was forced to reform and to reestablish her currency system.

Mr. President, if the 1-year limitation shall remain in this bill, we shall have this summer a gigantic sum of money placed in circulation, and as the value of money comes down and commodity prices go up. If wheat goes up to a dollar or a dollar and a half a bushel, if corn goes up, and cotton goes up, and oil goes up, and labor becomes employed, we will be advised that the depression is a thing of the past, and then during the campaign this fall we will be admonished not to change engineers while in the middle of the stream.

Mr. President, I call attention to some startling statements made yesterday. I can not understand them; perhaps I am not supposed to understand them; but on page 4136 of the RECORD the distingushed author of this bill makes this astounding charge:

> Apparently the officials of the Bank of France have outwitted some of the officials of the Federal reserve system and have them in that rather awkward position.

What does that statement mean? It means that the Federal Reserve Board of America is not able to compete with the financial officials of the nation of France. The Senator from Virginia says that the officials of the Bank of France have gotten the better of our Federal Reserve Board, that they have outwitted some of the officials, and to this moment they have us at a disadvantage.

Then on yesterday, the distinguished Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT] made a charge against the Federal reserve system. He said it was not perfect, but if we would just let this bill go through we would get busy very shortly and would amend the Federal reserve law. My distinguished friend from Virginia, I know, did not like that statement, because he does not believe that the Federal reserve law should be overhauled. I note also that the President is in favor of scuttling the Federal reserve system, for in his first message to the Congress on the 8th of December he said:

> The need of a sounder system is plainly shown by the extent of bank failures.

He is talking about banking laws; he is talking about the Federal reserve system; he is talking about a system of finance enacted by a Democratic Congress, and signed by a Democratic President. Under the Democratic administration, the Federal reserve system worked perfectly. Under it we fought and won the war, and while we were fighting and winning that war we were financing numerous allies across the sea. When the law was administered by its friends, it worked most satisfactorily—but now in the hands of its enemies it has all but broken down.

Under the law, managed and executed by its friends, we had a united and a happy people; everybody was employed; wheat sold for from two to three dollars a bushel; cotton sold for 40 cents a pound; corn sold for $1.75 a bushel, and oil sold for $3.50 a barrel. How different to-day—cotton selling for less than 5 cents a pound; oil selling for 75 cents a barrel; wheat selling for 50 cents per bushel; and millions of our people are unemployed. The Federal reserve system, managed by its friends, made America prosperous, and now in the hands of the enemy it has permitted America to become prostrate.

Mr. President, we hear on every hand that the banks now are full of money. This prompts the question: How much money have we in the banks? I pause for an answer. There is no answer. How much money have we on deposit in the banks? Again I have no answer. How much money have the banks of America in their vaults to-night?

I have here the report of the Comptroller of the Currency, which, I presume, is the best authority. The report is dated December 7, 1931. That is two months ago. The statistics are of date June 30, 1931. That is 8 months ago. I want to answer these questions for the benefit of the RECORD. This report shows that on the night of the 30th day of June, 1931, the 22,000 banks of America had on deposit $56,864,744,000.

The President evidently thinks that is money. In one of his messages recently he said that the banks were full of money, but that instead of loaning the money the banks were keeping it hoarded.

Mr. President, do the banks of America have $56,000,000,000 on deposit? "Not now," says a Senator, and he is correct. The deposits have been deflated. Some $10,000,000,000 of deposit money has disappeared. To-night the banks of America have on deposit only some $46,000,000,000. The President thinks that is money. It is not gold, not silver, and not even paper. I will tell you what kind of money it is.

The distinguished Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH], who is doing me the honor to listen to me, has some large farms down in his native State, and such farms produce a vast amount of cotton. This is only for illustration. I hope the Senator will pardon me. Last year he raised thousands of bales of cotton. He had this cotton picked and ginned and compressed.

He had this cotton all ready for export. Cotton in that condition is illustrative of what is termed liquid assets.

For illustration, the Senator went to his bank, a little country crossroads bank away out among his farms, and said, "Mr. Banker, I need $10,000." The banker said, "What security have you?" He said, "I have 1,000 bales of cotton." "All right; you sign this note for $10,000 and pledge your 1,000 bales of cotton." Everyone concedes that such a note so secured would be good. The bank handed the Senator the note, and he signed it. Immediately the credit was created and the sum of $10,000 of credit money was placed on deposit.

The Senator did not need the currency; he needed only the credit. He wanted it so that he could write checks against it. That night the little crossroads country bank had its deposits increased by the sum of $10,000. The Senator had not placed a penny in the bank, but the moment his note was accepted the credit was created and the deposits in that crossroads bank jumped up $10,000.

The small country bank did not want to carry this $10,000 of credit money, so the next day they sent the note and collateral down to their county seat for rediscount. The note was accepted and a new deposit was made there. Then that night the deposits of the bank at the county seat jumped up $10,000. Not being a banker, if I make a misstatement I hope some of my banking colleagues will correct me.

In turn the note and collateral is sent from bank to bank, until it may reach New York. It may pass through and become a credit deposit in any number of banks. If the note should reach New York it would have passed through perhaps five banks, so that the one note could have created as much as $50,000 credit or deposit money.

The President evidently thinks that $50,000 is money.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. He is not the only one.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Yes; the President must think that is money; but if that is money, it is "Hoover prosperity" money.

Mr. President, with $46,000,000,000 on deposit how much real money have all the banks of America in their vaults to-night? Altogether they have not $1,000,000,000 of real money—gold, silver, and currency—in their vaults to-night. I have not examined the vaults, but I have the record. There has not been a single night in 10 years, so far as I can learn, when all the banks of America had as much as $1,000,000,000 in gold, silver, and paper in their vaults at one time.

Some years ago I was trying to present a case before the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives. I was in favor of paying the soldiers' bonus and of paying it in cash; and I made the statement there that the banks at that time had $55,000,000,000 on deposit, but that that night they had not a billion dollars in their vaults; and a member of the Ways and Means Committee took me to task. He said, "Why, young man"—I was younger then than I am now—"do you mean to tell this committee that the 30,000 banks of America have $55,000,000,000 on deposit and they have not that much money in their vaults?"

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. As a matter of fact, the banks, instead of being full of money, are full of debts.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I thank the Senator. He has coined an epigram that will reverberate through this campaign.

Mr. President, I am supporting the bill; but I do not want it limited to a life of only 12 months.

Why, Senators, you who believe in free silver, if this bill passes as it now stands, next year you will see the same influence upon money that we saw in 1873 when silver was demonetized. At that time silver was good money. Silver was demonitized, deflation was the result, and the most severe panic of the century was brought about.

Mr. President, I hope this 1-year limitation will be stricken from the bill. The Federal Reserve Board will still have full discretion. In the interest of those whom I am trying to represent I favor enacting these provisions into law and then retaining same permanently as a part of our banking legislation.

Mr. President, I have consumed entirely too much time, but I want to refer to one or two other matters before I conclude. I ask some of the financial experts of the Senate how much monetary gold there is in the world.

Mr. KING. Eleven billion dollars.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I am advised by our walking encyclopedia, the distinguished junior Senator from Utah [Mr. KING], that there are $11,000,000,000 of monetary gold in the world. He is correct

How large a cube of gold would $11,000,000,000 make? According to the best calculations I can make the $11,000,000,000 of gold, if coined into one square block, would make a cube 31 feet square. If Senators will turn their attention to the other side of the Chamber and imagine that we have cleared out a corner of the Chamber, I will picture the size of that gold cube. Of course, it would disturb matters a good deal over on the other side to clear out the space now, but after the 4th of next March there will be plenty of room over there in which to put this cube of gold. [Laughter.]

Beginning at the northeast corner of this Chamber, 31 feet would bring us to the flag just this side of the door. Beginning at the same corner and running south 31 feet would bring us to the first column to the right of the door. The fourth corner would be at the chair now occupied by the distinguished junior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. KEYES]. The top of the cube would be far below the ceiling. With all the monetary gold in the world thus placed in that corner of this Chamber there would still be plenty of room left to transact the business of the Senate. Yet this cube of gold, 31 feet square, is the basis of the money, trade, and commerce of the millions of the peoples of the earth.

How many people are there in the world? The estimate is 2,000,000,000. That cube of gold, if divided equally, would give us all only $5.50 per capita.

At this point I want to read from the statement of a very eminent banker. He is George L. Browning, president of the Seaboard National Bank, of Los Angeles. I read just one or two short paragraphs. The article is headed "Foreign Credits," and he says:

> A reserve in gold, sufficient in amount, is impossible.

That is what this distinguished banker says, that it is impossible to have a sufficient reserve in gold. He says further:

> We find only about eleven billions of monetary gold in the world and we now have in this country about $5,000,000,000 of gold, or 45 per cent of the world's supply, and dare not take much more from our foreign neighbors.

As usual, my good friend the Senator from Utah [Mr. KING] was absolutely accurate, according to this authority. This is what Mr. Browning says:

> If we do not have a national reserve of adequate proportions, it is entirely possible for conditions to become so severe that we should have to follow the example of Germany, of France, of Italy, and of other nations—revaluing our currency. The dollar value in gold might find a new level of 50 cents, 60 cents, more or less, instead of 100 cents.
> It is very probable that England is now taking steps which ultimately will make it imperative for her to reduce the gold value of the pound sterling from approximately $4.86 per pound to a fraction of the normal value, possibly as low as $2.50 or $3 per pound.

This banking authority says that Great Britain is now debasing her currency through expansion, or through inflation. Already England has gone from the gold standard, and after a while, when the pound sterling has fallen as low as that country thinks it should, no doubt the pound sterling will be revalued and stabilized at around $2 or $2.50 for the pound. Whereupon Great Britain will go back upon the gold standard.

I read further:

> Now England must face credit inflation that she may give to her people wage increases and apparent, if any temporary, prosperity.

How is Great Britain helping her people? By inflation. How is America proposing to help her people? By inflation. That is the only foundation for this bill, it is the only excuse for the bill, and the thing I object to is that it is proposed to permit this inflation to last for only one year. I want it to last longer and indefinitely.

Senators, we can not live at the present price or value of the dollar. It is an absolute impossibility. The United States owes $19,000,000,000. The States owe billions of dollars. The cities owe billions of dollars. The people owe the banks some $35,000,000,000. The corporations owe some fifty billions. Public debts and private debts, when added together, make more than $150,000,000,000 of debt. A hundred and fifty billions of debt is what we owe, and that little block of gold is the basis of it all.

Divide the total of our debts by eleven billion, and you have thirteen. Hence the people of America to-day owe 13 blocks of gold the size of the one I have tried to picture in the corner of the Senate chamber. We can not pay our obligations, our debts, public and private, based upon the present value of the dollar.

Those of our citizens who hold these notes and bonds have one of two alternatives. They can either sacrifice a part of their value by permitting the dollar to come down, or hold to the present high standard of value of the dollar and take the chance of losing all.

I read further from the article by Mr. Browning, still speaking about Great Britain:

> Thus she may guard against the dangers of revolution and political uprisings which otherwise might break up the great British Empire.

Mr. President, we can not pay these debts in America; they are not being paid now. Farmers can not pay their taxes; they can not pay their interest. School districts can not pay their interest. Cities can not pay, counties can not pay, States can not pay, and to-day in this, the richest government on earth, we are borrowing money ourselves to pay the interest on our own Federal obligations.

I am for this bill, but I want this 1-year clause stricken out. Then in the future, if we want to repeal the law, that is for us to determine. All the time loans would be within the discretion of the board.

This will bring about inflation, or that is what I hope it will do, that is what must be done, and those who are seeking to prevent inflation—of course, I mean within reason—in my judgment if they knew the result of their action would at once desist.

Mr. President, I do not know how much money this will place in circulation. I hope it will do some good. I do not think this bill, if it shall be enacted, will solve the situation, but it is a step in the right direction. In my judgment, it will take two more bills to bring about satisfactory results. You can not bring about the return of prosperity by loaning money to the big banks of the country. You can not bring about a return of prosperity by loaning money to the railroads of the country.

At this point I am reminded of the statement made recently by the President to this effect that—

> America can not squander herself into prosperity.

Mr. President, we are proposing to loan ourselves into prosperity, and in order to accomplish this we must borrow, and I submit I am unable to see a difference in the two proposals. The bill may do some good, but until we get some buying power into the hands and pockets of the laborers of the country, in the hands and pockets of the farmers of the country combined, embracing 60,000,000 of our people, we will have only a sham prosperity. If something can be done to get the money into the hands of those 60,000,000 of our citizens, there will be such a rush of spending as this country never saw. They will begin to buy flour, meat, potatoes, overalls, shoes. This will make business for the little store. It will make business for the city store. It will make business for the wholesale houses. The railroads will have to transport the goods back and forth, and so it will make business for the railroads. The busses and trucks will assist in carrying the goods and the people, and all the time the little banks will be getting added business. As fast as the small banks collect a few thousand dollars they send it to a larger bank, and the larger bank sends it to a still larger bank, and eventually the big banks get the business. This understanding of business practices explains the reason why I have been in favor of a program of internal improvement. Unless something like this is developed we can not have a return to prosperity.

Another way to help the situation is to provide for the payment of the balance due on the soldiers' bonus certificates. That will help something like 4,500,000 of our soldiers, placing money in their hands that they need and which is due them. We owe it to them. The moment they get the money they will spend and invest it and thus help every section of the country.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I am glad to yield.

Mr. BORAH. I understand the Senator's very interesting argument is that he has arrived at the conclusion that the bill will undoubtedly increase commodity prices.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. The Senator is correct.

Mr. BORAH. And that it would to a large extent bring national prosperity.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. BORAH. That is the best argument for the bill I have heard. I wish I could feel convinced.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. That is what I am arguing, that the bill will do what the Senator has indicated by his question he wants it to do. It will do the things that my answer indicates I want it to do. But when money is placed in circulation and becomes plentiful and commodity prices rise, then in a year's time the bill dies automatically. Credits will become cramped, money will become scarce, and commodity prices will fall. A few men in the country who understand the mechanics of money will make money on the commodities going up, and when the end of the year approaches they will make untold fortunes on the fall of commodity prices, and that is the thing to which I object. The striking of the 1-year limitation will prevent the evils I have suggested.

Mr. BORAH. The only provision that expires in a year's time is the provision with reference to borrowing on Government securities, is it not?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I think that is in the discretion of the Federal Reserve Board.

Mr. BORAH. I understand that there is no provision of the bill that expires in a year except that one.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. That is what I am seeking to strike out—the 1-year limitation.

Mr. BORAH. I refer to this provision:

> Provided, however, That at any time within 12 months from the date of the approval of this act, should the Federal Reserve Board deem it in the public interest, it may, upon the affirmative vote of not less than a majority of its members, authorize the Federal reserve banks to offer, and the Federal reserve agents to accept, as such collateral security, direct obligations of the United States.

That is the only provision which is limited in time in the bill, is it not?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. If the Senator's construction is correct—and I think he interprets the provision fairly—we agree at least to the effect of my amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER. The House bill applies the 1-year limitation to the first paragraph.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; I had forgotten the limitation in section 2.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Oklahoma yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I yield.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. In view of the Senator's answer to the question of the Senator from Idaho, I feel it necessary to ask the Senator another question. I could not be on the floor all the time the Senator was addressing the Senate. In view of the fact that he said the bill would raise commodity prices and restore prosperity so long as it is in effect, will the Senator please explain how he expects that to be done under the bill?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I can explain how it can be done by the fact that it has already been done. Even the newspaper reports that the bill was to be introduced raised the price of wheat in Chicago and raised the price of commodities and stocks in New York. If the bill passes and becomes a law, I have reason to believe that commodity prices and stock-market prices will rise immediately and materially. But unless something in addition is done to help the masses, the flurry will be only temporary.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. The Senator will remember the stock market went up after the moratorium was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. On the same theory.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. And also after the formation of the credit corporation and also after it was announced that the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill was to be passed, but the stock market came down after the passage of all those bills.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Exactly.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I would like to have the Senator from Oklahoma or any other Senator explain how the passage of this bill will raise commodity prices.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. I have stated that in my judgment it will not raise prices like it should. It will raise them some; and if we could get money into the hands of the people of the country, then the bill would raise commodity prices substantially.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. If the Senator has already explained, I shall not question him further but will read his speech in the RECORD in the morning.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, I want to exhibit to the Senate a few samples of some antiques.

I have here first what is termed a $10 gold certificate. I want to explain for the RECORD, not for the Senate, because I can not tell Senators anything about these, that a $10 gold certificate is not money. It is nothing more nor less than a receipt for $10 in gold in the Treasury. It passes for money, however. We are always glad to accept it as money. It says "$10," but also it says it is simply a receipt for a $10 gold piece or two $5 gold pieces or $10 worth of gold in the Treasury. That is all a $10 gold certificate is.

I exhibit to the Senate a silver certificate. This is nothing more nor less than a receipt for silver. Some place in our financial system is a silver dollar that the holder of this receipt can get in exchange for his certificate. That silver dollar is not worth a dollar in gold. This dollar is paper, and the silver that is back of it is worth only 29 or 30 cents. Yet this is a dollar and performs the services of a dollar. No one refuses it because it is not redeemable in gold.

Here is another bill. Senators can tell from its size that it is not of recent vintage. It is a Treasury note. I had to get this money from the subcaverns of the Treasury. Most of this money is not in circulation any more. It was once, but not now. That piece of paper is secured by nothing more than a standard silver dollar.

Then, I have another note that came from the isolation of the Treasury Department. It is called a "United States note." That is an antique and out of circulation. This note is secured by a gold reserve of less than 50 per cent of its value. Some place in the Treasury or in the financial system of the Government there is less than 50 cents worth of gold to redeem that $1 bill. That is all that is back of it, yet that dollar is good and we are all glad to have it.

I exhibit to the Senate next a bill called a "Federal reserve note." That is what we have in current circulation. This note is issued by the Federal reserve system. It is secured by 40 per cent gold and by 60 per cent of commercial paper. That note is in current circulation.

I exhibit to the Senate next a Federal reserve bank note. This note is entirely out of circulation. There may be a few scattered around, but I say it is entirely out of circulation because it is theoretically so. As soon as the few outstanding bills can be called in, it will be entirely out of circulation. Upon what is this based? It is not based upon gold. There is not an atom of gold back of it. It is not based upon silver. There is not an atom of silver back of the note. All that is back of the note is another paper note just like it. It is redeemable in "lawful money," and this is all lawful money, so the Federal reserve bank notes are not based upon gold, not based upon silver, not based upon commercial paper, but are based upon lawful money.

Then we have the last of the series, a note called national-bank currency. Here is a bill called a national-bank note. That is not based upon gold; it is not even based upon silver. It is based upon the debts of the country. It is based upon three series of bonds issued about 30 years ago. Those three bond issues have the circulation privilege. They can be secured by a national bank, sent to the Treasury, and the Treasury issues the full value of those bonds in national-bank currency. I exhibit now one of those notes. It is not based upon gold; it is not based upon silver. It is based wholly upon debts evidenced by three series of bonds known as the 2 per cent consols.

Senators, if gold and silver, when coined, are already money; if gold and silver can be made a basis for money; if part gold and part commercial paper can be made a basis for money; if the bonds of the Government and the notes of the people can be made a basis for the issuance of currency, then what excuse is there for not having an ample supply of money, at all times, in this Nation?

The bill proposes a way to increase the amount of money in circulation. Why limit such increase to one year?

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I do not propose to take very much time in discussing the pending bill. After the able address of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], followed by the splended presentation by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT], it seems to me that nothing more is needed to convince us of the importance and the desirability, if not the absolute necessity, of this measure. The fact is, I am somewhat amazed that the bill was not presented earlier in the session. It seems to be highly commended by the Treasury Department, by the officials of the Government, and by the banking and currency committees of both bodies. It is referred to as a source of great relief for present conditions and as a plan which, if carried out and developed, will make for safety in our banking and currency system and relieve the country generally.

I repeat, I am surprised it was not presented earlier in the session. If it had been presented, probably there would not have been any necessity for the enactment of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill. Now we are somewhat engaged in financing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation. Thus far, according to the newspapers, that corporation has made loans to two railroads. Undoubtedly the bill before us is sound, and it is a very important, if not a vital, measure. I will not dwell upon it in detail after the splendid explanations of it which have been made by those who have been engaged in the study and investigation of the question for months and months past, and after the strong indorsement by experts, and, so far as I can see, generally the banking interests themselves recognize that it is a measure which is very much needed at this time.

I am not afraid of any inflation under it. The fact is that I am not adverse to some increase in the circulating medium. I think we really need some. We certainly need to stop the deflation, and that can be accomplished by providing a means of inflation to some extent. I will not discuss that thought, because, in the first place, I rather question that the banks will take full advantage of this measure even after it shall be enacted into law. I doubt if we will find that very many groups of independent banks in the Federal reserve system will apply for the loans provided for in this bill. I hope they will; I want to see them do it; but, in view of the failure in recent times of banks to cooperate and assist each other, and the disposition generally for each bank to look out for itself, I question whether we are going to find many groups of five banks that will join in making application for loans under this bill, should it become law. However, there undoubtedly will be some. Then, provision is made for others in the bill as now presented.

In the next place, I have some doubt whether, if the banks shall avail themselves of the facilities provided by this bill, the funds raised and the loans made to the banks will be distributed as they might be and used as they might be to help along the situation respecting business, trade, industry, and agriculture. The banks, as the Senator from Virginia showed so clearly yesterday, have not been utilizing the eligible paper which is in their portfolios as they might utilize it, and which there was real need for them to utilize.

I can understand the position of some of the banks, perhaps most of them. There has been a general decline in deposits. Banks have had to keep that in mind. There has been a nervousness and apprehension on the part of bank depositors and a disposition now and then to inaugurate raids and runs upon banks. Therefore, the banks had to keep themselves in a liquid condition so that they could respond immediately to the demands of their depositors. The minute a bank can not pay over to a depositor on demand the amount of money which he placed in the bank, that minute the bank must close its doors. The banks realize that, and so, in order to prepare for emergencies, and in order to preserve their interests as well as the interests of the depositors, as they conceived them to be, they have been extremely cautious and have not been willing to show in their statements bills payable as they would have to show if they borrowed from the Federal reserve system. They apprehended that statements showing bills payable by a bank might weaken the confidence of the depositors to some extent and create groundless apprehension and cause suspicion with reference to the banks. So the bankers have been cautious.

Will they avail themselves of these facilities? Will they utilize the paper which will be available to them for the purpose of rediscount by the Federal reserve system, and get the proceeds of those loans; and if so, will they put that money into their vaults and fail to make loans to their customers and advance the business welfare and the interests of manufacturing enterprises of various kinds and help along the progress and development of the country? Will they do it? I am not so sure whether they will or not. I think we ought to give them the opportunity of doing it, and this bill does provide a means whereby the banks can assure their depositors of their safety and their ability to liquidate at any time and also put themselves in position where they can take greater risks and make loans and accommodate their customers to a greater extent than they have been doing.

As to the question of the time limit, I am inclined to think that the limitation of one year should not militate against the measure. I know that the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Mills, advocated before the House committee in the hearings that this measure ought to be made permanent law, and I am inclined to agree to that; but, at the same time, there are some reasons why we might well limit its operations to one year. One is the danger of depleting our gold reserve to such an extent as to jeopardize the gold basis for the operation of our banking and currency system. Another reason is that at the end of one year, if the system is found to be operating successfully and serving the purposes intended, Congress will be in session and it will be perfectly easy to extend the operations of the law. Our action now in this respect does not necessarily mean a finality. We can try it for one year; and if it serves its purpose, as we hope it will, and proves of great benefit to the country and also advances our banking and currency system and places our financial affairs on a proper basis, then it will be easy enough, and it will be the duty of Congress to extend the operation of the law and make it permanent.

There is one situation, too, that may cause us some little disappointment in the operation of this measure. The country is, as the Senator from Oklahoma has well said, in a very bad financial situation. Take, for instance, the National Government. In 1932–33 the estimated receipts will be $2,374,960,502, and the estimated expenditures will be $4,112,909,950, making a deficit of $1,727,949,048 for 1932–33.

The June deficit, as given out at that time, was $903,000,000. So that the Federal Government itself is not in a satisfactory situation as far as finances are concerned.

Then the local governments—States, counties, and municipalities—generally throughout the country are greatly in debt; and the taxation on the people of this country annually now amounts to $21,000,000,000. That is an enormous burden for the people to carry. Property is being sold for taxes; and municipalities, districts, counties, States—counties, especially—are not able to meet their outstanding bonds and obligations. Taxes are increasing everywhere, and people are complaining about the taxes—not only the local taxes can not be reduced but the Federal Government has to increase taxation in order to take care of this deficit and balance its Budget. It seems to me we are fast approaching the point where it will be impossible for the citizen who owns property to provide any safe or adequate collateral for his paper if he wants to borrow money; so that I do not think we are in any danger of any inflation here.

The one question in my mind when I first read the bill was whether we were not jeopardizing our situation as a country on the gold basis. If you will look at the Federal Reserve Bulletin which I have here of January, 1932, regarding the monetary gold stocks and currency and gold reserves, you will see that it is apparent that about $739,212,000 of gold could be freed under this bill. Throughout the hearings before the House committee it was referred to as $750,000,000; but the bulletin will show, when you analyze the statement, that the correct figure really is $739,212,000 of gold. This $739,212,000 of free gold referred to is the net amount after deducting gold which might be withdrawn by foreigners based upon dollar obligations now outstanding.

Our ability to remain on the gold standard under these circumstances will be predicated upon the amount of additional dollar exchange convertible into exportable gold created by, first, the sale of foreign-owned American securities; and, second, collection of dollar drafts by foreigners for imports into the United States from countries which have gold-export embargoes or moratoriums on currency conversion into dollar exchange.

There are no published figures on which the amount of foreign-owned American securities can be accurately determined. On the other hand, present imports are at the rate of about $250,000,000 per month, of which about $100,000,000 per month are from embargo countries.

It would appear, therefore, that the $739,212,000 of excess gold, if utilized for additional currency reserves to the fullest extent, would give us no reserve to provide for these contingencies. We would then be in the position of being forced off the gold standard by the continued selling in our markets of foreign-owned American securities, and by the increasing adverse unfavorable balance-of-trade payments due to our inability to offset exports to a large number of countries against our imports from those countries.

I desire to have inserted here a statement analyzed from the bulletins mentioned showing these countries. For instance, countries having exchange control are Argentina, Austria, Australia, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Peru, and New Zealand. Countries off the gold standard are Denmark, Ecuador, Great Britain, and Norway.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the statement will be printed in the RECORD.

The statement is as follows:

(1) Congress appears to be willing to inflate currency to the extent of $2,700,000,000, based upon the following showing by the Federal Reserve Bulletin of January, 1932:

Federal reserve note circulation statement, December 31, 1931

Issued and outstanding	$2,624,471,000
Actual security:
Gold, 70 per cent	2,130,122,000
Eligible paper, 30 per cent	915,125,000
	3,045,247,000
Legal requirement for security:
Gold, 40 per cent of notes outstanding	1,049,788,400
Eligible paper, 60 per cent notes outstanding	1,574,682,600
	2,624,471,000
Excess of gold above legal requirement:
Actually deposited for notes	2,130,122,000
Legal requirement for notes	1,049,788,000
Excess	1,080,334,000

Under proposed new law this excess can be used as basis for new currency on the same 40–60 ratio; that is, $1,080,334,000=40 per cent of $2,700,835,000; 60 per cent of Government securities or eligible paper, $1,620,501,000=60 per cent of $2,700,835,000.

(2) However, whether $1,080,334,000 of gold is actually available to secure currency is to be determined by analyzing the following figures taken from Federal Reserve Bulletin for January, 1932:

Monetary gold stock Dec. 31, 1931		$4,641,000,000
(a) Gold required for currency now outstanding	$2,535,788,000
(b) Gold required if foreign-owned deposits and acceptances are withdrawn	1,266,000,000
		3,801,788,000
Net amount of gold freed by Glass-Steagall bill		739,212,000

Currency required October 31, 1931, and per cent and amount of gold required for money in circulation:

(A) GOLD REQUIRED FOR CURRENCY NOW OUTSTANDING

Gold coin, 100 per cent	$368,000,000
Gold certificates, 100 per cent	1,118,000,000
Federal reserve notes, 40 per cent	1,049,788,000
Total gold requirement	2,535,788,000

(B) GOLD REQUIRED IF FOREIGN-OWNED DEPOSITS AND ACCEPTANCES ARE CONVERTED AND WITHDRAWN

Nov. 30, 1931, dollar acceptances for imports	$243,000,000
Nov. 30, 1931, dollar acceptances to finance shipments between foreign countries	544,000,000
All foreign bank deposits in Federal reserve banks Dec. 31, 1931	79,000,000
French bank deposits in member banks	[1] 400,000,000
Total gold-exchange items	1,266,000,000

COUNTRIES HAVING EXCHANGE CONTROL

Argentina, Austria, Australia, Brazil, Chile, Colombia, Peru, and New Zealand.

COUNTRIES OFF THE GOLD STANDARD

Denmark, Ecuador, Great Britain, and Norway.

Mr. FLETCHER. I was a little disturbed about that, and I proposed an amendment better to safeguard our position in that matter; but I am not clear, after having an opportunity to read the House hearings, that it will be desirable to offer that amendment. I want to speed the consideration of this bill as much as possible. I refer to some statements in the House hearings which would seem to reassure us on that question by Mr. Mills, Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. McFADDEN asked him:

Would you not, for the benefit of the committee, give us the total amount of gold in the United States, and just where it is located, and how it is located?

Secretary MILLS. I will be very glad to; the total amount is about $4,400,000,000, I think, Mr. McFadden, but I would be very pleased to put the figures as to how it is located and such information into the record.

Then he elaborates that statement by placing this in the record:

Of the $4,400,000,000 of gold in the United States, about $3,000,000,000 is held by the reserve banks, the remainder being in the United States Treasury or in circulation. Of the $3,000,000,000 in the reserve banks, $2,000,000,000 must be held, under existing law, as collateral against Federal reserve notes, and an additional $550,000,000 is required as reserves against deposits, leaving about $450,000,000 of gold not required either as collateral or as reserves. This amount is known as "free gold."

That appears on page 25 of the hearings.

On page 26 Mr. McFADDEN says:

In other words, it is indicated a certain amount is on deposit; then, of course, through the sale of foreign-held acceptances they can withdraw gold, and through the sale of securities other than that, just what is indicated at this time, so that we may know?

Mr. Mills then gives this reply:

Secretary MILLS. Mr. McFADDEN, no one can answer that question with any degree of certainty; no one knows the amount of American securities held abroad. All that anyone can answer, and answer with a great deal of confidence, is that we have on hand sufficient gold resources at home to permit us to meet all of the demands that may be made.

That, of course, is very reassuring, and it is a positive statement. It is followed further by this:

Mr. McFADDEN. What I was getting at particularly was the amount of foreign balances here that might be withdrawn. It is indicated France is drawing $125,000,000 now, by the press.

Secretary MILLS. I do not know how much the Bank of France has on deposit in this country; they have a certain amount of gold earmarked with Federal reserve banks; they have a certain amount invested in acceptances, and they have a certain amount on current balances with commercial banks.

[1] Estimated.

Mr. McFADDEN. It is not known to you, then, the amount of possible withdrawals at this time?

Secretary MILLS. By the Bank of France?

Mr. McFADDEN. By foreigners.

Secretary MILLS. I do not see, Mr. McFADDEN, how anyone could know that.

Mr. McFADDEN. Well, it was stated in September that there was a possibility of withdrawal of a very large amount of money.

Secretary MILLS. I did not see them from any responsible source; of course, anyone is entitled to speculate all he wants, but I am here as a responsible Government official, supposed to give you facts, and I will say to you I have no facts which would enable me to determine what the total withdrawals might be from the United States, from all over the world, but I do say to you that I am perfectly confident of our ability to meet all demands that may be made upon us.

Mr. McFADDEN. Without this legislation have you that ability?

Secretary MILLS. This legislation, by making the total amount of our excess gold immediately available, strengthens our position; there is no question about that.

In those circumstances, with those emphatic assurances, I am not sure I will bother to introduce the amendment which I prepared and which is on the desk.

The situation regarding the banks is a matter which has been discussed to some extent. The statement of December 21, 1931, shows that there were 22,071 banks operating in the United States. That number included 6,805 national banks.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield before leaving the testimony given by Mr. Mills? I should like to call his attention to that testimony.

Mr. FLETCHER. I yield.

Mr. BLAINE. On page 26 of the House hearings Mr. McFADDEN asked this question:

What I was getting at particularly was the amount of foreign balances here that might be withdrawn. It is indicated France is drawing $125,000,000 now by the press.

Secretary MILLS. I do not know how much the Bank of France has on deposit in this country; they have a certain amount of gold earmarked with Federal reserve banks, they have a certain amount invested in acceptances, and they have a certain amount on current balances with commercial banks.

I call the Senator's attention to the fact that Mr. Mills entirely evades the question, and he seizes upon the last paragraph of Mr. McFADDEN's question. That was the amount that France might withdraw; but he does not answer the question as to the amount of foreign balances that might be withdrawn.

Has the Senator any information as to what those foreign balances may aggregate?

Mr. FLETCHER. If the Senator will turn to page 27, he will find that Secretary Mills refers to that further. Mr. McFADDEN says:

Mr. McFADDEN. Well, I recall now that, in a conference at the White House last September or October, it was stated at that conference that a very large amount of gold could be withdrawn; I wondered if the same situation exists now as existed then.

Secretary MILLS. Very considerable withdrawals took place in September; in the month of October and early November we lost some $700,000,000 of gold, as you know, and subsequently there was a return flow of gold, up to the end of the year, since the first of the year—gold withdrawals have amounted to approximately $50,000,000.

Mr. BLAINE. Yes; but the main question is, What is the amount of foreign balances in America that may be withdrawn? That is a very important proposition; and I was wondering if the Senator has any information as to the approximate aggregate of balances in the banks of the United States held by foreign governments and their subjects.

Mr. FLETCHER. No; I can not answer that question with certainty. I have not the information. I have seen no facts stated that cover that precisely, and I do not know whether that can be stated.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not want to interrupt the Senator longer; but, as I recall, the Annalist, a commercial bulletin, discussed that matter. I am not sure that I have the issue; but, as I recall, that publication asserted—and it seemed to me at the time with justification—that there was in round numbers two billion and a half of deposits in America held by foreign governments and by the subjects of foreign governments; that of that two billion and a half France had a free balance, that is, outside of its earmarked gold, of about $250,000,000. If that is correct, there is a potential menace to our gold reserve and, as a matter of fact, to our gold standard, under the present world condition. I would like to have the views of the Senator as to that possibility.

Mr. FLETCHER. I think myself there is a possibility of danger there. But, as I have said, this bill would be the law for only a year, and I do not believe it will be possible to decrease our supply of gold reserve within that time, at least under ordinary operations, so as to force us off the gold standard. The bill ought to be helpful, as we hope it will be, in that matter.

Mr. BLAINE. Interrupting further, Mr. President, I was going to suggest to the Senator that I expected to debate that proposition, and I was wondering whether the Senator has some accurate information upon the question.

Mr. FLETCHER. I am sorry I have not inquired about that in particular, and I do not find it discussed in the hearings, therefore I am not able to give the Senator definite information. I shall be glad to hear the Senator deal with it.

I was proceeding to state the situation of the banks. This is a statement of December 21, 1931. Deposits in all banks amounted to $56,864,744,000. In the national banks there were $19,244,347,000.

I would like to insert in the RECORD another statement I have just obtained from the Comptroller of the Currency, showing what protection depositors now have under our law. This statement would indicate that there is no need for this prevailing apprehension or nervousness on the part of depositors. It is a statement of the capital stock of all national banks, the surplus of all national banks, the undivided profits, and the deposits. I ask to have it inserted in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

FEBRUARY 18, 1932.

Office of the Comptroller of the Currency advised that as of December 31, 1931—

Capital stock of all national banks (6,373)	$1,621,449,000
Surplus	1,381,612,000
Undivided profits	351,597,000
Deposits	19,244,347,000

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, there is one defect in our law, perhaps, and I think we ought to take steps to assure depositors in these banks that their money will be safe. Of course, we have no control over the State banks. We have a little indirect control of State banks which are members of the Federal reserve system through the regulation of the Federal Reserve Board. State banks which are members of the system have certain privileges and get certain benefits out of that association, and certainly to the extent that they are members of the system Congress has some effect over their operations. Outside of that, of course, we can not extend our jurisdiction as to the State banks. If we set an example here as to the national banks, the member banks of the system, the State banks will likely follow along wise and proper lines.

Here is one defect, I think, which we ought to correct. According to the statements which I have seen—and I have every reason to believe they are quite accurate—only about 60 per cent of the double liability of the stockholders of national banks is ever realized. In case of failure, or trouble, or liquidation, the double liability does not protect the depositors as it should. We ought to find some way whereby that entire liability of the stockholders of the national banks shall go to the protection of depositors in those banks. I think that can be done. We can so legislate, I think, as to give that additional protection, and it ought to be adequate protection to the depositors of the national banks.

That is one aim we must strive for, that is, to assure protection to the millions of depositors in the banks, some of them ruined forever, who lost all they have accumulated in their lifetime by reason of failures of banks, in recent years particularly. We ought to find some way to protect those people who trusted the banks and who placed with them their accumulations of a lifetime. I think we can do that. That is another step which I hope the Congress will take before we finish this entire program of legislation with reference to banking.

Mr. President, I wanted to get this much in the RECORD, and, as I have said, I would like to proceed as fast with the bill as possible. I suggest to the Senator from Virginia that if he is ready he should have the bill taken up first for committee amendments and then proceed with it to its final passage.

Mr. KEAN obtained the floor.

RECESS

Mr. McNARY. I move that the Senate take a recess until to-morrow at 12 o'clock.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate (at 4 o'clock and 50 minutes p. m.) took a recess until to-morrow, Friday, February 19, 1932, at 12 o'clock meridian.

NOMINATIONS

Executive nominations received by the Senate February 18 (legislative day of February 17), 1932

ASSISTANT SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY

James H. Douglas, jr., of Chicago, Ill., to be Assistant Secretary of the Treasury, to fill an existing vacancy.

APPOINTMENT, BY TRANSFER, IN THE REGULAR ARMY

TO FIELD ARTILLERY

Second Lieut. Walter Edgerton Johns, Cavalry, with rank from June 9, 1928.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 18, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Merciful God, endue us with genuineness, with truth, with humility, with softness of speech, and with love. Bless us with this cluster of flowers from the heavenly garden. Do Thou crown us with high moral moods and quicken our spiritual instincts. Bless us with Thy unfailing guidance and give us the very best conceptions of life and duty. May we be patient under burdens, hopeful under difficulties, and inspire us with that supreme truth that we are the children of God. Bring out of our own natures a greater capacity to understand and a greater willingness to seek the whole truth. Purify our hearts, clarify our intellects so that the essential drift of our daily lives shall be away from sin and toward a higher and a better life. Bless every one of us with good thoughts, happy words, and cheerful hopes. In the name of Jesus. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bills and a joint resolution of the House of the following titles:

H. R. 81. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Catawissa Railroad Co. to reconstruct, maintain, and operate a railroad bridge across the Susquehanna River at or near Catawissa, Pa.;

H. R. 6304. An act to transfer Lavaca County from the Houston division to the Victoria division of the southern district of Texas;

H. R. 7247. An act authorizing the Rhode Island State Board of Public Roads and the State Highway Department of the State of Connecticut to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Pawcatuck River near the location of the present Broad Street Bridge between Westerly, R. I., and Stonington, Conn.; and

H. J. Res. 271. Joint resolution amending section 1 of the act entitled "An act authorizing the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved July 3, 1930, relating to the Mississippi River between the mouth of the Illinois River and Minneapolis.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill and a concurrent resolution of the House of the following titles:

H. R. 268. An act to excuse certain persons from residence upon homestead lands during 1929, 1930, and 1931 in the drought-stricken areas; and

H. Con. Res. 19. Concurrent resolution providing wreath to be placed on the grave of the mother of Washington on February 22, 1932.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House is requested:

S. 487. An act for the relief of Herbert G. Black, owner of the schooner Oakwoods, and Clark Coal Co., owner of the cargo of coal on board said schooner;

S. 499. An act authorizing the erection by the National Masonic Memorial Association of a memorial building at Fort Benning, Ga.;

S. 567. An act to authorize the Secretary of War to sell to the Philadelphia, Baltimore & Washington Railroad Co. certain tracts of land situate in the county of Harford and State of Maryland;

S. 1021. An act for the relief of Joseph J. Baylin;

S. 1567. An act establishing a revolving fund to be administered by the Secretary of Agriculture for agricultural credit purposes;

S. 1690. An act to make provision for the care and treatment of members of the National Guard, Organized Reserves, Reserve Officers' Training Corps, and citizens' military training camps who are injured or contract disease while engaged in military training, and for other purposes;

S. 1692. An act to amend section 90 of the national defense act, as amended, relative to the employment of caretakers for National Guard organizations;

S. 1768. An act to provide for the opening and closing of roads within the boundaries of the District of Columbia workhouse property at Occoquan, Fairfax County, Va.;

S. 2265. An act to extend the time for repayment of certain loans to farmers for the crop of 1931;

S. 2307. An act to provide for the settlement of damage claims arising from the construction of the Petrolia-Fort Worth gas-pipe line;

S. 2623. An act for the relief of Howard Donovan; and

S. 3282. An act to extend the times for commencing and completing the construction of a bridge across the Bay of San Francisco from the Rincon Hill district in San Francisco by way of Goat Island to Oakland.

BICENTENNIAL OF BIRTH OF GEORGE WASHINGTON

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD at this point by printing the proclamation issued by the President, inviting the people to organize and join in fittingly commemorating the bicentennial of the birth of George Washington.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

The proclamation is as follows:

BICENTENNIAL OF BIRTH OF GEORGE WASHINGTON

BY THE PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

A proclamation

The happy opportunity has come to our generation to demonstrate our gratitude and our obligation to George Washington by fitting celebration of the two hundredth anniversary of his birth.

To contemplate his unselfish devotion to duty, his courage, his patience, his genius, his statesmanship, and his accomplishments for his country and the world refreshes the spirit, the wisdom, and the patriotism of our people.

Therefore, I, Herbert Hoover, President of the United States of America, acting in accord with the purposes of the Congress, do invite all our people to organize themselves through every community and every association to do honor to the memory of Washington during the period from February 22 to Thanksgiving Day.

And I hereby direct that on the anniversary of his birth the flag of the United States be appropriately displayed upon all Government buildings in the United States and all embassies, legations, and offices of the United States abroad.

In witness whereof, I have hereunto set my hand and caused to be affixed the seal of the United States.

Done at the city of Washington this first day of February, in the year of our Lord nineteen hundred and thirty-two, and of the independence of the United States of America the one hundred and fifty-sixth.

HERBERT HOOVER.

By the President:
HENRY L. STIMSON,
Secretary of State.

LOAN OF PICTURES OF GEORGE WASHINGTON

Mr. GILBERT. Mr. Speaker, I call up Senate Concurrent Resolution 14.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That consent is hereby given to the United States Commission for the Celebration of the Two hundredth Anniversary of the Birth of George Washington, or a duly authorized committee thereof, to remove temporarily to the Corcoran Art Gallery, for exhibition in the bicentennial portrait exhibit to be held as a part of such celebration, any portraits in the Capitol Building (not in the public corridors), including the following:

George Washington, by Rembrandt Peale, in the Vice President's room;

George Washington, by Gilbert Stuart, in the Post Offices and Post Roads Committee room;

John Marshall, by Martin, in the Supreme Court robing room;

Frederick Muhlenberg, copied from a Wright portrait by Samuel B. Waugh, in the Speaker's lobby; and Oliver Ellsworth, copied from an Earl portrait by Charles Loring Elliot, in the Supreme Court robing room.

The resolution was agreed to.

House Resolution 148 was laid on the table.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION 14

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my own remarks on the "lame-duck" resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. WOODRUM. Mr. Speaker, an almost continuous session of my committee prevented my participation in the consideration of the recent so-called "lame-duck constitutional amendment." I voted against the submission of this amendment. About a year ago this matter was before Congress for consideration and, at that time, the House of Representatives added an amendment the purpose of which was to limit the second session of Congress. In that form I voted for a submission of the constitutional amendment. In consideration of the present constitutional amendment the House of Representatives refused to insert a provision limiting the second session, and the resolution as it passed the House placed no limit whatever on the sessions of Congress.

Undoubtedly there are reasons which would seem to justify such an amendment to the Constitution. Generally speaking, those reasons are grouped under two headings. First, that under the present system a Member of Congress does not actually take over his legislative duties for 13 months after his election; and, second, that under the present system there is a session of Congress after a general election and that defeated Members of Congress, or "lame ducks," participate in this legislative session.

There is, undoubtedly, some merit in both of these objections but, in my judgment, the objections are more theoretical than real. In the first place, while a Member of Congress elected in November, in the absence of a special session of Congress, does not actually take the oath of office until a year from the next December or 13 months from his election, yet what actually happens is that the Member takes office on March 4 following his election, is provided office space, a secretarial staff, immediately takes over the business of looking after the interests of his constituents, and utilizes the intervening time in the very necessary routine of contacting the various Government departments and serving what one might call his legislative apprenticeship. In the event of a special session of Congress, of course, he immediately enters upon his legislative duties.

In my judgment, it is a wholesome thing to have a considerable intervening time from the election of Members of Congress or perhaps the change of a national administration before the time comes for the national legislative body to convene and begin to pass legislation. Political campaigns and especially national campaigns are oftentimes heated and bitter. To come out of such a campaign when, as I have said, there has perhaps been a change of administration, and immediately put new power in the new Congress to work, would indeed be dangerous and perhaps expensive experience. A few months cooling time is, in my judgment, most wholesome and necessary. If the country needs emergency legislation, the present Constitution provides a way in which Congress can be convened at any time the President so elects.

The second objection, that defeated Members of Congress who have been repudiated by their constituents are permitted to vote on legislation after such defeat, is the most serious objection to the present system. Yet when one stops to scrutinize the course of events, it is very hard to find specific instances where this element of Congress has really asserted a decided influence or where, because of their activities as a group or individually, bad legislation has been passed or meritorious legislation defeated. Again, I say that this objection is more theoretical than real.

By far the most serious objection and the deciding influence, so far as I am concerned, is the fact that under the proposed amendment to the Constitution, it will be possible and, in my judgment, altogether probable, that Congress, once it is convened with no limitation upon either of its sessions, will remain in practically continuous session. Nothing, to my mind, could be a greater menace to economic solidarity than the probability or possibility of having the national legislative body in continuous session. It is hard for me to understand how the business interests of the country and many of the leading newspapers can apparently so strongly favor the proposed constitutional amendment when they have almost universally protested against long and continuous sessions of the national legislative body.

I am still of the old-fashioned school who believe that it is a most dangerous experiment to be meddling and tinkering with our National Constitution. Indeed, I have made it a rule not to vote for any constitutional amendment unless, after the most careful deliberation and study, I am firmly convinced that unless such a proposal is embodied in the Constitution that free and representative government is in danger and the peace and prosperity of our citizens threatened. This is a rigid rule, but it seems to me that in the light of past experiences it is justified. I apply this rule to the present constitutional amendment and find myself with the small minority in voting against its submission.

COMMITTEE ON INDIAN AFFAIRS

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present two unanimous requests. The first is that the Committee on Indian Affairs may have the privilege of sitting during the sessions of the House to-day.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Nebraska?

There was no objection.

PERMISSION TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. HOWARD. Now, Mr. Speaker, the second request is that on Thursday morning next, after disposition of matters on the Speaker's table, I be permitted to address the House for 17 minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. I object.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, may I have one moment to make an announcement? I desire to announce that I have dropped in the basket this morning a new piece of legislation differing from anything we have had here yet.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

Mr. CROSSER. Mr. Speaker, I wish to announce that my colleague, Mr. SWEENEY, is absent on account of illness.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries.

DEPARTMENTS OF STATE, JUSTICE, COMMERCE, AND LABOR APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9349) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes. And pending that, may I say that I am informed it is the desire on both sides of the aisle that the bill be taken up for consideration under the 5-minute rule on Saturday, and that general debate be arranged accordingly. It is my purpose to make a general statement as to the bill as reported just before we take it under the 5-minute rule, and I will reserve time for that purpose.

Mr. SHREVE. What time does the gentleman suggest for general debate?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. General debate may continue until Saturday. There probably will be an agreement to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow and on Saturday, in order that we may give as much time as possible to those who desire time.

Mr. SHREVE. And general debate will run along until Saturday?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. PARSONS. Is it expected that we will have a vote on the bill on Saturday?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. No. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the time for general debate be equally divided, the time to be controlled by the gentleman from Pennsylvania and myself.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. ARENTZ. I would like to ask the Speaker if it is the purpose to dispense with the Private Calendar to-morrow?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I understand the House will probably agree to a motion which will be made to have this bill kept before the House until it is disposed of. We expect to have general debate to-morrow on the bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama moves that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill H. R. 9349.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. MCREYNOLDS in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to dispense with the first reading of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS].

Mr. BYRNS. Mr. Chairman, I have only a limited time at my disposal. There are some few things I wish to say, and while I desire to be entirely courteous to everyone, I sincerely hope that I shall be permitted to proceed at least for awhile without interruption. If at the conclusion of my remarks I have any time, I shall be more than pleased to yield to any gentleman who wishes me to do so.

Yesterday the President sent to the Congress a message in which he recommended that he be given the power to make consolidations of various governmental agencies and bureaus, which he did not name in his message. Every Member of the House, I believe, is heartily in favor of any consolidation that can properly be made, and there is no Member who has served here for any length of time who does not know that there are duplications in every department of this Government. We are appropriating not thousands, but millions of dollars which could be saved if a wise and proper consolidation of many of the governmental agencies was made and steps were taken to cut out the immense duplication that is now going on and has been going on for years in the past.

I was impressed with the message of the President. It occurred to me, however, that it was somewhat hastily, probably suddenly, prepared. I do not think anyone can read that message, which gave little or no information to Congress, without coming to that conclusion. Speaking for myself, I have wondered whether or not it was not hastily sent, because the House, under the splendid leadership of our distinguished and beloved Speaker and the majority leader, was contemplating upon its own account proceeding to consolidate some of these agencies in the interest of economy and efficiency. I am led to that conclusion by the fact that the President waited until the Committee on Appropriations, where all appropriations originate in the Congress, had actually prepared and either passed through the House or had ready for report to it, every appropriation bill save four, the Army, the Navy, the District of Columbia, and the legislative appropriation bills. Why is it that the House was not given last December the benefit of such suggestions as the President might have to make upon the subject of consolidation in the interest of economy and efficiency, so that they could have been put into effect at this Congress and for the next fiscal year? There was a reference made in the message, which was not necessary in discussing the subject at hand, which leads me to believe that perhaps the message was sent here also to stave off a favorable report upon a bill which I introduced after conference with a number of Members in this House, consolidating the Departments of the Army and the Navy into one great department to be known as the Department of National Defense.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BYRNS. I would rather not yield at this time.

Mr. BLANTON. The President's Cabinet officers are against that proposal, and both the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy are fighting it, and every one of us who are for consolidation know that during the time since when Mr. Hoover became a Cabinet officer and since he has been in the White House as President there have been more bureaus and expensive commissions created than in any other like period of time in the history of the Government.

Mr. BYRNS. I was coming to that. The bill to which I refer has been pending before the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments for a number of weeks, and during that time there has never been a more powerful lobby, in my judgment, at work here in this Capitol in opposition to it. If permitted to demonstrate it, I think I could show you and the country that if you will enact it into law it will save probably $100,000,000 annually when it gets into full operation and not interfere in the least with the efficiency of our fighting forces either in the Army or the Navy. [Applause.] Yet the President, who says that he is in favor of consolidation, announces in advance in this message that he is not in favor of consolidating these two departments. And the heads of these two departments, as the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] said, who hold no commission from the people, who do not represent the people, but who hold their commissions solely from the President, appeared before that committee, presumably with his sanction and in the interest of their own jobs, opposed the bill being reported out of that committee, so that an opportunity could not be given to the House to pass judgment upon it one way or the other. Not only that, but high officers in the Army, and particularly in the Navy, under the command of the President, have left their desks in the departments and have spent their time up here on Capitol Hill in the committee room and elsewhere opposing that bill. They are objecting to its being reported by the committee to the House so that the light of day can be shed upon it and you and I and others who may be for or against it may have an opportunity to express ourselves upon the subject.

If the President really favors consolidation, if he is really interested in economy, I wish to say to him and to the country that he can save infinitely more by the passage of that bill than he can by consolidating every other agency in this Government. [Applause.] Yet those under his command, those who hold commissions from him, are seeking to prevent a committee of this House from reporting that bill out for consideration. Those two suspicions of mine as to the real motive which prompted this message at this time are my justification for rising this morning to discuss for a while this message which has been sent to the Congress.

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman be kind enough to give us his estimate of what will be saved by the consolidation referred to?

Mr. BYRNS. I have already done that, but if that bill be reported out—and I hope it will be, and expect it will be—then I expect to ask time of the House, when I shall discuss it at length. Of course, I can not do it in 15 minutes.

I want to make this suggestion while I think of it. There is something for which legislation is not needed when considerable savings can be made. The President was inaugurated three years ago next March 4. He was heralded over the country as the greatest administrator who had ever entered the White House. It is said—and I have never heard anybody contradict it—that he has created more commissions and more independent boards, some of them without legal authority—and I say that advisedly—than any other President in the history of the entire country. [Applause.] I think he could make a good start in the interest of economy, because all these commissions and boards are spending public money, by abolishing them and devolving their duties upon the legally constituted agencies of this Government which are in a position to render the service for which these boards and commissions were appointed.

I wonder if the President has just realized that there is such a thing as an overburdened taxpayer, to whom he refers in this message. I wonder if he has just become aware that it was owing to the reckless extravagance of the administrations of which he has been an important part that the Government has run into a deficit unequaled by many times in the history of this Government in peace times, a deficit of $903,000,000 last year under his administration, a deficit which will be at least $2,100,000,000, and probably more, under his administration on June 30, 1932. If something is not done the taxpayers and consumers of this country will have to dig down into their pockets to the amount of $1,400,000,000 in order to balance the Budget in June, 1933, after his administration has come to a close.

Mr. O'CONNOR. Final close?

Mr. BYRNS. Final close. That is what I meant. That is the record he is going to leave as to a wise administration of the fiscal affairs of our country. And yet all he does now is to make the feeble gesture of sending in a message when he learns that a Democratic House is about to take up the question of consolidation. The people are not going to be so easily fooled.

Now, the President came into the White House, as I have said, three years ago next March. He came in accredited, as I have said, with being a great public administrator, and with the announcement to the Congress and to the country that we must have a consolidation of agencies in this Government in the interest of economy, and particularly of efficiency. Three years have passed. During those first two years of his administration he had a great majority of his own party in both Houses of Congress, and yet nothing was done. No steps have been taken, except to consolidate the Veterans' Bureau and the Pension Bureau, and, in addition to that, not to consolidate but to actually divide the prohibition personnel, placing part of it in the Department of Justice and leaving part of it in the Department of the Treasury, which Mr. Doran says is costing more money than it did when they were together, and securing no better enforcement.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Tennessee 10 additional minutes.

Mr. BYRNS. So I repeat. Why should we now, late in February, be confronted with this message?

Do you know what the President of the United States for the past three years has had at his command? He is in command of every executive department of this Government, and he has a right to tell those executive departments and the heads of independent bureaus, from the head down, to do this or to do that and to gather any information he needs for his own convenience. In addition to that, he has the Bureau of the Budget, placed exclusively under his control, which is costing the Government now $200,000 or more.

Let me read to you for a moment just what the law says that the Bureau of the Budget shall do:

SEC. 209. The Bureau of the Budget, when directed by the President, shall make a detailed study of the departments and establishments for the purpose of enabling the President to determine what changes, with a view of securing greater economy and efficiency in the conduct of the public service, should be made in (1) the existing organization activities and methods of business of such department or establishment; (2) the appropriations therefor; (3) the assignment of particular activities to particular services or the regrouping of services. The results of such study shall be embodied in a report or reports to the President, who may transmit to Congress such report or reports or any part thereof, with his recommendations on the matters covered thereby.

What was the object of Congress in enacting that particular section of the Budget law? It was to give the President of the United States, through this Bureau of the Budget, for which we have appropriated every dollar he has ever asked, an opportunity to do just what he says now, three years after he became President, he would like to have Congress authorized him to do. He has had authority all along to gather the most complete information, but what definite recommendation has he made to Congress with reference to the consolidation or regrouping of services in our Government?

But that is not all. There is a Bureau of Efficiency, and a very competent and efficient bureau, with a courageous and intelligent man at its head, appointed by the President, for which appropriations of $200,000 or more are made every year, and that bureau was established exclusively for the purpose of investigating various departments of our Government and ascertaining where economies and better efficiency could be put into effect So he has had the Bureau of Efficiency under his control in addition to the Bureau of the Budget.

But that is not all. He has the General Accounting Office, with an appropriation of $4,000,000 every year, which the President could call upon for information and work if he needed it. Then, too, he has had sitting by his side in the Cabinet Hon. Walter F. Brown, the Postmaster General, who was the head of the commission to which I will refer hereafter, and who could have offered him advice by reason of his work on that commission.

Now, think of all that great force under his exclusive control and supervision. Why has he waited three years to come here, not to propose something but to tell you that if you will just pass a law giving him the right to do this regrouping during the closing months of his administration he will be able to promote better efficiency? But I tell you if you read that message as closely as I have you will not see where he has stressed very much the question of economy. The only real recommendation he makes in his message is the creation of eight great high-salaried offices [applause], three or four of them new offices, and the others promotions of a director or commissioner to the position of Assistant Secretary. He says that will cost only $40,000. How does he know? I tell you, Mr. Chairman, and I am talking to men and women who know, that there never was an Assistant Secretary created in this Government that did not require a personnel far beyond anything that might be paid to him or his secretary. Create those eight positions if you will.

But I want to tell you that instead of reducing expenses it would be but a few years before you would be appropriating millions of dollars to take care of the personnel in each of these separate offices. [Applause.]

It is significant that while the President tells us he proposes to create these high places—and you note he wants Congress to approve that at the outset—he does not tell us where he is going to reduce in any way. He does not tell you any particular office he is going to abolish. He does not give you the slightest information along that line.

Why, gentlemen, we have been talking about consolidations for the last 12 years. You will remember that just at the beginning of the war Senator Overman introduced a bill in the Senate, which became known as the Overman Act, which gave President Wilson, for the the duration of the war and no longer, the right to consolidate and to regroup services. But the war was on, and naturally you could not expect any real regrouping of services during that time. Then, nothing having been done, for the reasons I have stated, on December 17, 1920, there was created a Joint Committee on the Reorganization of the Executive Departments. Under the provisions of the law creating it, it was required to report on the second Monday in December, 1922. President Wilson went out of office on March 4, and Mr. Harding became President. After he became President, on May 5, with a majority of his party in each House, a representative of the Executive was authorized to be appointed as a member of the joint committee at $7,500 per annum. The most anomalous situation that ever occurred, so far as I know, in the history of legislative proceedings was a joint commission of the Senate and House with its chairman named by the Executive from the outside and who really became the commission. Members of that commission told me after that was done that they abandoned all hope and all interest in it. The chairman of the commission at that time was the present Postmaster General, Mr. Walter F. Brown, from Ohio, who was appointed by President Harding.

However, they did something. They filed a rather voluminous report. But they secured an extension of time for filing the report to July 1, 1924.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. BYRNS. Then, on June 3, 1924, the joint committee filed a report signed by Senators SMOOT and Wadsworth and Representatives MAPES and TEMPLE, and a supplemental report was signed by Senator HARRISON and Representaitve R. Walton Moore. That report has been lying here without action. The party of the President has been in power during all these years. No attempt has been made to act upon it or even to consider, so far as I know, the suggestions made therein for a regrouping of services.

The President was Secretary of Commerce at that time and afterwards appointed Mr. Brown one of his assistants, and yet we heard nothing from him or anyone else with reference to consolidation. Then, as I said, when he came in three years ago he proposed consolidations, but the matter was dropped and nothing done.

I do not want to take up the time of the committee, and I am going to cut short some of the things I wanted to say. There was one thing which struck me as peculiar about this message, and that was that the President wants Congress to pass this bill and leave the matter entirely up to him. Of course, he says that he will make his report and send it to Congress, and that if nothing is done within 60 days, then it shall become the law. Well, Congress is not going to change it if it is required that it shall be done within 60 days, especially when there is opposition to it. I can fancy that if we passed a bill such as the President proposes it would be a very foolish gesture to provide in it that it shall not go into effect until 60 days after its report to Congress, because if there is some opposition to it, particularly at the other end of the Capitol, you and I know it would never be given final consideration within that time.

I am not personal in this matter. I am speaking from the standpoint of the record which has been made by these public servants in the interest of economy.

I have told you something about the great deficit that has occurred under the administrations of which the present President was an important part. He was Secretary of Commerce, becoming so on March 4, 1921, and he remained as Secretary of Commerce until he became President, on March 4, 1929.

Let us see just how much he has contributed to these reckless expenditures which have been going on during the past year and just what his part has been toward promoting a situation where we find it necessary to take practically everything the taxpayer has in order to balance the Budget. When he became Secretary of Commerce the appropriations for that great department amounted to $24,369,069.15. When he left the department, in 1929, the appropriations for the Department of Commerce, under Mr. Hoover as its Secretary, had increased to $40,049,168.02, an increase of practically 66⅔ per cent.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. BYRNS. Under Mr. Hoover as President that great Department of Commerce is now drawing from the Government and expending out of the Treasury the sum of $54,422,230, more than twice the sum that was being appropriated for it only 11 years ago, when Mr. Hoover assumed charge.

Under the law as it exists to-day, the President of the United States has the power to consolidate offices in the Department of Commerce and in the Department of Labor and to regroup those services, and I suggest, in the interest of economy and, I think, better efficiency, our distinguished President—and I speak of him with the greatest respect—might exercise the administrative power he has in cutting down the expenses of that great department over which he once presided.

In 1926, under the influence, it was generally understood, of the then Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Hoover, the President of the United States without asking Congress and without any legislation, because he did not need it, transferred from the Interior Department to the Department of Commerce two great bureaus of this Government. One of them was the Patent Office and the other was the Bureau of Mines. Let us see what happened to the appropriations after those bureaus left the Department of the Interior and went over to this great executive, the Secretary of Commerce. At the time they were transferred the appropriations for the Patent Office, in 1926, amounted to $2,808,800. In 1929, when the President left the Department of Commerce to assume the office of President, they had increased from $2,808,800 to $3,394,415.

Let us take the Bureau of Mines. In 1926 the Bureau of Mines, when in the Interior Department, was expending the sum of $2,101,560. It was transferred to the Department of Commerce and in 1929, the last year when the President was Secretary of Commerce, there was appropriated for it the sum of $2,681,618.

So, my friends, I am justified, I think, in saying that the President has played his part in helping to increase these great appropriations which we are now seeking so hard to reduce, and which the Ways and Means Committee is finding it so difficult to meet in the way of taxes.

Now, I want to say this and then I am going to close. I want to compliment the Members on both sides of the House for the unanimity with which every Member has stood in behalf of economy. There are very few, if any, exceptions I would make if I were called upon to take the roll and go down from top to bottom. I want to compliment you gentlemen upon this side, and those upon my own side, upon the fact we have come here with a determination to hold down appropriations and help, as far as we can, to balance the Budget. I am sure this is going to be the history of this House when it is written at the end of the session.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Tennessee two more minutes.

Mr. BYRNS. I have just been handed a statement here which I am going to read you. It is along the lines of the statement I have just been making, showing that even since the President entered the White House the appropriations have increased.

Under Mr. Wilson, in 1921, the expenses of the White House were $293,680, while for the present year of 1932, including the police force, they amount to $652,179, a rather substantial increase in itself.

Now, gentlemen, the point of my criticism, let me conclude, is this: The President of the United States, as it was his duty to do under the Constitution, should have used these great agencies of the Government, not this year or last year, but three years ago, when he became President, to ascertain the facts and to recommend to this House and to the Congress a consolidation of these great agencies which he now says can be made with such great economy and efficiency. [Applause.] Having inexcusably waited two years, he could have sent them up last December in the form of an alternative Budget, and let Congress put them into effect at once without having to wait until after the next election to consider them. I am satisfied in my own mind that if he had sent up an alternative Budget based upon the facts, and convinced this Congress that it meant not only economy but better efficiency, there is not a man in this House who would have opposed it, and we would have put it into effect and saved additional money.

In view of his own delay for three years without taking any steps when his own party was in power, it is not singular that at the first opportunity a Democratic House organization should take steps to do that which he has neglected doing for the past three years. [Applause.]

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES].

Mr. MAPES. Mr. Chairman, I read in the newspapers a short time ago a statement emanating from the Democratic leaders to the effect that the era of cooperation with the administration was over and that the country might now look for an era of politics. Judging from the goings-on here on Capitol Hill during the last few days and the speech of the gentleman from Tennessee, who has just left the floor, I conclude that that statement is correct.

The gentleman from Tennessee said that he spoke as the representative of a party that not only believed in economy but had a record for economy. That statement reminded me of a speech which I distinctly recall having heard made on the floor of this House by a former distinguished Democratic chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, in the Sixty-third Congress—the gentleman from New York, Mr. Fitzgerald—in his endeavor to hold down the appropriations then being made by the Democratic Party and to keep them somewhat in line with his party platform.

Just as an indication of what the record of the Democratic Party is on economy, I would like to quote from this distinguished representative of the party in regard to it. Mr. Fitzgerald, the Democratic chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, in the Sixty-third Congress, said, and I am quoting from the RECORD of April 10, 1914:

> Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, it may seem somewhat strange, but I hope it is not out of place, to remind Members on this side of the House that the Democratic platform pledged us in favor of economy and to the abolishment of useless offices; but it did not declare, Mr. Chairman, that the party favored economy at the expense of Republicans and the abolition of useless offices in territory represented in this House by Republicans while favoring a different doctrine wherever a Democratic Representative would be affected. In a few months I shall be called upon in the discharge of my official duties to review the record that this Democratic House shall have made in its authorization of the expenditure of the public moneys. Whenever I think of the horrible mess that I shall be called upon to present to the country on behalf of the Democratic Party [laughter on the Republican side] I am tempted to quit my place. I am looking now at Democrats who seem to take amusement in soliciting votes on the floor of this House to overturn the Committee on Appropriations in its efforts to carry out the pledges of the Democratic platform. They seem to take it to be a huge joke not to obey their platform [laughter and applause on the Republican side] and to make ridiculous the efforts of the members of our party who do try to live up to the promises they made to the people. I know that some Members on this side are voting continually for appropriations because they fear the wrath of the public if they do not vote out of the Public Treasury assistance for everything anyone suggests. I have in my hand a letter which is somewhat characteristic of the correspondence which I receive daily.

If I placed my political fortunes above my sworn duty under the law, I would not attempt to carry out the promises of the Democratic platform, but I should place myself at the head of this band of Treasury looters upon every occasion.

This is the record for economy of the Democratic Party, the party which the gentleman from Tennessee now represents in this House.

It is always interesting to see the enthusiasm of new converts to a cause. They frequently deceive themselves into believing that they have originated something new and sometimes, as is the case here, try to take credit for it when others have, as a matter of fact, pioneered in the cause for years. So it is in this case. Not content with announcing the program of the Democratic Party, the gentleman from Tennessee has attempted to attack the record of President Hoover for economy and his stand for the reorganization of executive departments. The Democratic Party undertakes a big job when it undertakes to criticize or attack the record of the present President of the United States on this program of economy and of reorganization of departments. His record is unassailable in that respect.

He has a consistent record in that respect, to my personal knowledge, of more than 12 years. He has advocated, during those years, in season and out of season, a reorganization of the different bureaus and activities of the Government, recommending that some be abolished, others consolidated, and all of them put into a jurisdiction where they would have proper supervision, to the end that waste and duplication in the Government service might be eliminated.

No amount of talk can alter the record. The President's record in that respect, or upon that policy, is consistent from beginning to end. I repeat that he has urged such reorganization in season and out of season. He advocated it in public and in private all the time he was Secretary of Commerce, and he has urged it on Congress in every message that he has sent to this body since he became President of the United States. [Applause.]

The gentleman from Tennessee referred to the Joint Committee on Reorganization of the Executive Departments, appointed in pursuance of a resolution passed in December, 1920. Some of you will remember that that resolution was fathered by a former Member of Congress, Mr. Reavis, of Nebraska. He introduced it, spoke for it, fathered it. The agitation for such reorganization was first started by the American Society of Engineers, of which the President was a distinguished member, and at one time, I believe, its president, and Mr. Reavis voiced the sentiment of that society here in the House.

That committee consisted originally on the House side of the gentleman from Nebraska, Mr. Reavis, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Doctor TEMPLE, and the gentleman from Virginia, Mr. Moore. From the Senate it consisted of Senator SMOOT, Senator Wadsworth, of New York, and Senator HARRISON, of Mississippi. Some of you know that the resolution provided that the President shall have a personal representative on the commission, to be appointed by him, who should act as chairman, and President Harding appointed Walter F. Brown, of Toledo, the present Postmaster General, to that position.

Mr. Brown made an intensive study of the departments. He endeavored to get the cooperation of the heads of the different departments and of the Cabinet officers. After a year or more of such intensive study and work, he recommended a tentative set-up or plan for consolidation.

I may say in passing that in that set-up he proposed a consolidation of the War and Navy Departments.

I may say here too that in the process of time, the gentleman from Nebraska, Mr. Reavis, retired from Congress, and Mr. Webster, of Washington, was appointed to take his place. Afterwards, when Judge Webster resigned from Congress to accept an appointment to the Federal court, I was appointed to take his place. That was before the hearings before the joint committee were started, so I was a member of the joint committee and present when the hearings were had.

The joint committee held hearings on the tentative set-up proposed by Mr. Brown, starting January 7, 1924. I have a copy of them here. The joint committee heard every member of the President's Cabinet except the Secretary of State. He was not heard because there was no radical change proposed in the set-up of the State Department. All other members of the Cabinet were heard.

After the hearings closed the committee went into the subject exhaustively, in executive session. It finally drafted a bill to carry out its recommendations and drafted its report. Senator SMOOT introduced the bill in the Senate, and I introduced it in the House of Representatives. It came up during the short session of Congress in 1924 and 1925, I believe. Identical bills were introduced and pending in both Houses of Congress. Mr. SMOOT made a motion at one time to make the Senate bill the order of business in the Senate, but the majority of the Senate voted against that motion. Those of you who are interested enough to look at the roll call in the Senate on that motion will see that the most of the men who voted against that motion were Democrats of the Senate, and not Republicans.

After the Senate refused to take it up there was nothing to be gained in taking it up in the House, so it was never considered here.

During the next recess of Congress, in collaboration with the Department of Commerce, with Secretary Hoover at the head—or, to be more accurate, in collaboration with Secretary Hoover and his Assistant Secretary, Mr. Drake—a joint resolution was drafted which provided for the set-up of the joint committee of Congress, consisting of two Members of the Senate and two Members of the House and one man to be appointed by the President, to make a study of the departments and independent bureaus of the Government and report to the President any consolidation or reorganization which it thought best; and if the President approved of the recommendations of that committee, he was by Executive order to put them into effect. What was the experience with that joint resolution? First, let me say that after that resolution was prepared Secretary Hoover, Senator SMOOT, and myself went to the White House to interview President Coolidge to get his approval of the resolution, and we introduced it with administration approval. All along, from first to last, the leading spirit, the leading proponent of this reorganization program, was the present President of the United States—President Hoover. [Applause on the Republican side.] He was then Secretary of Commerce. He went to the White House with us; it was in his department and under his direction that the resolution was drawn.

I introduced it in the House, went before the Rules Committee, asked that a rule be reported out of that committee to make it in order, but the alleged constitutional question was raised to it by some of the Members of the Rules Committee, among them the then Democratic leader, Mr. Garrett, against reporting it, because it was a delegation of too much legislative authority to the President. It was never reported by the Rules Committee, and that attempt at reorganization failed, as had every other attempt of the present President of the United States, to put through some reorganization program and thereby prevent duplication and waste in the Government service.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. BANKHEAD. In other words, we gather from the gentleman's statement that he is undertaking to shift the responsibility from the President for failure to perfect these reorganizations to the Republican Party in Congress, which has been in control for some years?

Mr. MAPES. I am not trying to shift the responsibility from anybody; I am trying to keep the record straight; I am trying to put the responsibility where it belongs. It does not belong upon the shoulders of the present President of the United States, as your chairman of the Committee on Appropriations would lead the country to believe. [Applause on the Republican side.]

I have never made a political speech on this floor.

I make very few of them anywhere. I am not making a political speech now, but I think the RECORD ought to be correct in respect to the people who want economy and who have advocated economy, and the blame should not be laid where it does not belong. Credit should be given to the man who, in season and out of season, has advocated this proposition for so many years. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The gentleman from Tennessee referred to the expansion of the Department of Commerce during the administration of Secretary Hoover of that department. Yes; it did expand, and the gentleman from Tennessee might well have added that it increased in usefulness a hundredfold under Secretary Hoover's administration. In his eagerness to emphasize this new conversion of himself and the Democratic Party to a program of governmental economy, he forgot to give some of the well-known reasons for the expansion of the Department of Commerce under Secretary Hoover. He forgot to say that the Patent Office was transferred from the Department of the Interior to the Department of Commerce during Secretary Hoover's administration, bringing with it 1,228 additional employees to the Department of Commerce. He forgot to say that the Bureau of Mines was also transferred from the Department of the Interior to the Department of Commerce during Secretary Hoover's administration, bringing with it 971 new employees to the Department of Commerce. He forgot to say that during Secretary Hoover's administration of the Department of Commerce, Congress created the Civil Aeronautics Division of that department which now has 538 employees.

Who would attempt to say that this division is unnecessary and should be abolished? He forgot to say that during the administration of Secretary Hoover the department was required to make a census of agriculture and of manufactures, which increased the number of employees in the Bureau of the Census from 1,664 to 2,518, or an increase of 854. He forgot to say that by reason of the enactment of the laws regulating the Alaskan fisheries it was necessary to increase the employees in the Bureau of Fisheries from 462 to 700, or an increase of 238, during Secretary Hoover's administration. During that same time the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce increased from a personnel of 595 to 1,469, an increase of 874, due to the establishment by Congress of a much more effective organization in the interests of foreign trade. These transfers and additional activities of the department account for an increase of 4,703 employees, all of them due to acts of Congress or the transfer of other functions to the department, as against a total increase in employees of 4,608, or an actual decrease in the Government so far as administrative action could affect it of 95. During this period, of course, the business of the country increased by leaps and bounds, to say nothing of the constant increase in population.

During this same period the office of the Secretary shows a decrease from 183 employees to 144; the Steamboat Inspection Service, a decrease from 366 to 358; the Bureau of Navigation shows a decrease from 230 to 166 employees; the Bureau of Standards a decrease from 968 to 900 employees; the Bureau of Lighthouses, a bureau whose work is constantly expanding, a decrease from 5,909 employees to 5,905.

During the same period and from the time it was taken over by the Department of Commerce, the Bureau of Patents shows a decrease from 1,228 employees to 1,191, or a decrease of 37 employees, although the work was enormously expanded and although the revenue from these increases reverts to the bureau. It is interesting to know that that bureau, as a matter of fact, instead of being a cost to the Government has now become one where the Government makes a surplus.

That the expansion of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce as the result of various acts of Congress has more than justified itself is indicated by the fact that the number of inquiries from persons interested in the export business increased, during Secretary Hoover's administration of it, from 661,000 in the year 1923 to 2,770,000 in the year 1928. The cost of organizing and handling these inquiries from the American public was cut from $2.38 per inquiry at the beginning of this period to $1.34 at the end of the period.

The statement has been made that the consolidation of the World War Veterans' Bureau, the soldiers' homes, the civil-service pensions, and the Pension Bureau has resulted in the increase in the number of employees. That is true. They have increased from 31,576 to 36,408, or a net increase of 4,832. But in the meantime, Congress has enacted veterans' legislation which has increased the number of beneficiaries on account of whom payments are being made by the bureau, exclusive of insurance and adjusted-compensation benefits, from 1,079,044 to 1,557,790, or an increase in the number of persons having to be dealt with regularly each month by 478,746.

Furthermore, as the result of the increase in hospitalization by acts of Congress, the number of persons in hospitals has increased from 49,346 to 59,862, or an increase of patients of 10,516. Beyond this, the various acts of Congress passed since that time in connection with adjusted compensation have increased the number of persons with whom it has been necessary to open accounts from 1,378,862 to 3,647,855, or an increase in the number of accounts in this one branch alone of 2,268,993. In other words, while the number of employees in the bureau has increased by about 12½ per cent, yet the number of persons with whom the bureau has been called upon to deal has increased by 2,776,000, or more than 100 per cent.

Who is there here who thinks that there ought to be any material reduction in the office of the Veterans' Administration, which is charged with the responsibility of looking after the disabled veterans of all wars and of the widows and orphans of such veterans?

Nobody needs to take the word of anyone upon the question of the record of President Hoover for economy in the reorganization of Government departments. The record itself is conclusive. For example, on page 349 of the hearings before the Joint Committee on Reorganization of Executive Departments under date of January 22, 1924, Secretary Hoover said:

> No one who has had large experience in large industrial or other organizations will assert for one moment that the Federal Government is not badly in need of administrative reorganization. The fine results of the budgetary system in producing economies have now almost spent themselves unless there can be such a reorganization of Government administrative structure as makes it possible to secure better appropriation policies to eliminate overlaps and unnecessary division of functions. Moreover, whatever these reductions of expenditures may be, they are not, in my mind, as important as the economies to the public in its relations to the Government and in the large ability of Congress to handle certain types of expenditure with better comprehension and long-view policies.
> I do not believe that any Government reorganization will ever take place that will meet with agreement among the executive heads of the Government. Cabinet heads necessarily take color from their subordinates and subordinates are, from the nature of things, bound to be in opposition to serious change. If there is to be reorganization, it will have to be carried out by Congress and the President. The men who are at the head of various bureaus and secondary functions of the Government believe honestly and earnestly in the purpose of their service and they are bound to object to any change which seems to them would decrease their activities, reduce their personnel, or require them to take a less important position in some other grouping. They naturally and properly feel that the service which they direct is the most important function of the entire Government and that minimizing it in any direction would be wrong.
> Some of them feel so strongly that they feel it right to engage in propaganda in opposition to change. The cumulation of such activities from many sources is likely to break down every attempt at reorganization as hitherto. No one deserves higher admiration than the permanent officials of the Government, but long years of experience in reorganization of private concerns and some years of experience in the Government have led me to believe that if the overlap and waste in the Federal Government are to be eliminated it must be handed down from on high and not attempted as the result of agreements, for they can never be brought about.

I call attention particularly to the difficulties of our reorganizing the Government departments through legislative action, and I want to show you how consistent the policy of the President has been during all these years ever since he came into the Government service in 1921. On page 352 of those hearings he said:

In view of the accumulation of resistance which will come from Government officials to any grouping, obvious from the hearings before this committee and the propaganda in the country by interested bureaus against such groupings and reorganization, it will be extremely difficult to secure a precise set-up by congressional action. Plausible arguments are made pro and con which can only confuse the Members of Congress who are not able to give the time and attention necessary to get to the bottom of these questions. Furthermore, a complete rearrangement of organization to-day would require amendment again to-morrow. New functions and new activities are constantly under creation by Congress to meet the tides of necessity.

Here is a suggestion he made back in 1924, exactly the same as he made in his message to Congress yesterday:

I would therefore like to make a suggestion as to the method by which this matter could be handled with more certainty of success and assurance of accuracy, not only at the present moment but for the future.

Still the gentleman from Tennessee gets up here and says that this message of the President delivered here yesterday must have been hastily written. It is the result of the convictions of 15 years of active work and observation in the Government service.

Mr. BEEDY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. BREEDY. The gentleman from Tennessee, I think unintentionally, because he is eminently fair, quoted a section of the Budget, and I think he referred to section 209, in which he said to the Committee of the Whole that the President had always had the power to effectuate the consolidations that he now suggests to Congress and asks for in the special message. Of course, that is not the fact. He has the power under section 209 to direct the Bureau of the Budget to make examinations and report to him, and he, in return, reports and recommends to Congress.

In his special message of yesterday he asks that we delegate to him special power to effect consolidations, himself.

Mr. MAPES. Of course, the gentleman from Maine is right. With a very few exceptions, all the activities of the Government are created and put into the different departments by statutory law, and the President can not remove an activity from one department that has been created and placed there by law, without some authorization by some other law that repeals the existing one. That is self-evident.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I yield five additional minutes to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. MAPES. Of course, the gentleman from Maine is entirely correct.

Now, continuing the President's statement before the Joint Committee on Reorganization of Executive Departments in 1924, page 353, he said:

This suggestion is that Congress should give authority to the President—

Identically the same as he suggested yesterday—to make such changes within limits of certain defined principles as may be recommended to him by an independent commission to be created by Congress and clothed with these authorities. The broad principle of grouping by major purpose could be laid down by legislation and the major purposes of the departments could be likewise defined. The groups, according to major purpose, could be enumerated by the legislation and groups assigned to departments. Then the details of transfer of individual bureaus and functions to meet those principles could be left to the President upon the recommendation of such a commission.

Let me say to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] and to the other Members of the House that those who have had some experience in studying this reorganization problem are convinced that that is the only practical and feasible way, in fact, the only way, that a reorganization of the executive departments that is worth while will ever be accomplished. [Applause.]

With those principles defined and groupings decided—

then I believe that the reorganization should not only take place quickly and on sound lines, but also such a continuing body to make any changes that develop, as necessary, and take cognizance of new legislation in its relationship to administrative provision.

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], I repeat, said that the President's message must have been hastily written. He made that suggestion in 1924. What did he say yesterday in this hastily prepared message? This is what he said. I quote from his message, on page 4182 of the RECORD:

There is little hope for success in this task unless it is placed in the hands of some one responsible for it, with authority and direction to act. Moreover, the consummation of a comprehensive reorganization at one moment is not in the best public interest. Such reorganization should be undertaken gradually and systematically, predicated on a sound and definite theory of government and effectuated as the result of study and experience gained in the actual process of reorganization.

If anybody thinks that any effective reorganization program or any program worth while can be worked out overnight here in the House of Representatives, he has another guess coming.

The President said again at another point in his message to Congress of yesterday:

Authority under proper safeguards to be lodged in the President to effect these transfers and consolidations and authority to redistribute executive groups in the 10 executive departments of the Government or in the independent establishments, as the President may determine by Executive order, such Executive order to lie before the Congress for 60 days during sessions thereof before becoming effective, but becoming effective at the end of such period unless the Congress shall request suspension of action.

And still the gentleman from Tennessee would lead the House to believe that this message was hastily written. The haste has been all on the other side. In the consideration of this question of haste it may not be out of place to suggest that this message of the President was written and advance copies of it distributed to members of the press several days before it was read in Congress, to be released for publication when read. Let me ask if this resolution introduced in the House by the gentleman from Tennessee, creating a so-called economy committee was not "hastily written" and introduced after some one learned what was in the President's message?

Now, Mr. Chairman, I happened to be looking over the RECORD this morning of the proceedings of yesterday in another body, and in their order of business was Senate Joint Resolution No. 76, entitled "Reorganization of Executive Departments." The consideration of it was objected to by the Senator from Colorado, Mr. COSTIGAN, a Democrat. It was introduced by Senator GEORGE, another Democrat. Is this position of the President reasonable or unreasonable? Listen to the answer to that question of this distinguished Democratic Senator. Let me read his answer from the RECORD of yesterday.

Senator GEORGE. I want to take this occasion to emphasize the fact, and I believe it to be the fact, that if any progress is ever made in the consideration of consolidation of boards, bureaus, agencies, and services, or in the elimination of unnecessary boards, bureaus, agencies, and services, it must be done by vesting authority in some one who can act. I know of no one who is better qualified to act than the President of the United States at any time.

[Applause.]

That is from one of the leading Democratic Senators. Here is what he said further, after some colloquy, and let me say that after some study of this question his position is, in my judgment, absolutely sound. Nobody who has ever studied the problem of reorganization of executive departments can get away from it for a moment.

Here is what he said:

If we are going to do anything more than to pay lip service to economy—

Mark his language—

If we are going to do anything more than to pay lip service to economy, so far as it may be effected by consolidation and simplification of government, we must vest the power and authority to act in some one, and who better than the Chief Executive when we are dealing with the executive offices.

[Applause.]

Now, the gentleman from Tennessee says that the President has not submitted a program. It seems ridiculous to take the time of the House to answer that statement in view of his record. I have before me a speech which he made on the reduction of waste in Government by reorganization of executive departments, when he was Secretary of Commerce, before the thirteenth annual meeting of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, on May 21, 1927.

This is what he said in that speech:

Organization and coordination are essential in business. They are highly essential in government, for the Government is the greatest business undertaking yet submitted to the mind of man. Bad coordination among industries finally comes home to the people as a whole in the form of increased prices. And bad organization in government comes home in many more directions than even the taxes it wastes.

I want to interrupt the reading of that statement long enough to say this before I forget it: The only time the Congress has ever given any President authority to reorganize the executive departments was in time of war, when it gave it to your Democratic President, President Wilson, and he never exercised any power under it at all. [Applause.]

I do not criticize him for that, because it was during a time of great emergency; but when you talk about Presidents not acting, keep in mind that he was the only President who ever had authority to act and he took no action at all. If it was not unconstitutional to give a Democratic President such authority, why is it unconstitutional to give it to President Hoover?

Then the President went on to say, in this speech before the chamber of commerce in 1925:

And this is another of these laborious subjects in which stimulating oratory is about as serviceable as a sermon on high voltage, and it contains about the same proportion of humor and good cheer as a reminder that we have to work when the trout are rising.

Nobody ever made a more truthful statement than that. It is not oratory that is needed to conduct these reorganizations. It is some one with practical common sense who knows where the overlapping is and where the wastes are. Secretary Hoover continued:

Over many years our people have been striving to better the Federal administration. We have succeeded in two major steps.

Repeating the same thought he mentioned before the Committee on the Reorganization of Executive Departments:

We still have a third equally important and perhaps more difficult one to accomplish. The first step was the establishment of Government employment based upon merit; the second was the establishment of adequate control of appropriations through the Budget System. There still remains the third and even more important step to relieve the taxpayer of a greater but more obscure waste—that resulting from faulty organization of administrative functions. And the first two steps will never reach the full realization without the third.

In that speech he goes on to tell about the number of bureaus in the Government, the number of employees and the lack of any system in putting the different activities of the Government into different departments and how much could be saved by a thorough and businesslike reorganization:

Every single department, bureau, and board in the entire Government should be placed upon the operating table.

The gentleman from Tennessee says this message must have been hastily written, yet the present President of the United States said before the Chamber of Commerce in 1925:

Every single department, bureau, and board in the entire Government should be placed upon the operating table and a clean-cut separation established between semijudicial and semilegislative functions on the one hand and of administration on the other.

Then he says in another place:

To illustrate my point, I have made a partial collection of misfits and in so doing I have taken no account of either incidental functions or semilegislative or semijudicial agencies, except so far as they have administrative functions.

He then referred to the construction of public works and the number of bureaus or agencies, doing such work, 14 in all, and pointed out that they are located in 9 different departments. He pointed out at length what he thought ought to be done in that respect.

Mr. YON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. YON. This recommendation was made in 1925, and since that time the number of boards and bureaus has increased and the appropriations have increased. Why at this late date has nothing been undertaken?

Mr. MAPES. Something has been undertaken, I will say to the gentleman from Florida. Some of us for years have been trying to have something done but we have not been making as much noise as the Democratic Party has been making in the last few days about it. However, we have a real appreciation of the difficulties involved in it, and the present President of the United States certainly has tried in season and out of season to have something done but, as I have said, he has not succeeded in getting Congress to act, but it is no fault of his that Congress has not acted.

Mr. FREAR. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MAPES. Yes.

Mr. FREAR. Is not Congress responsible for the situation?

Mr. MAPES. Congress is absolutely responsible. I do not want to take the time to go into this at length, but many gentlemen here know that if you propose to change any activity of the Government the bureau or board affected will have some friend in Congress to oppose it. If we try to make a change some Member of Congress will say, "Well, it is going to affect my friend, I am not very much interested in it, so I guess I will protect him and vote against it." You get an accumulation of those situations in any general reorganization program to such an extent that it is absolutely impossible to put a bill through Congress which provides for a general reorganization of the executive departments. There is no question about that.

Mr. DYER. So the thing to do is to give the President the authority?

Mr. MAPES. Absolutely.

Mr. KETCHAM. If I recall correctly, my colleague who now has the floor served a number of years ago on a commission that went into this matter very exhaustively.

Mr. MAPES. I have called attention to that.

Mr. KETCHAM. I wanted to get the gentleman's judgment upon this proposition. Has the gentleman ever seen a more comprehensive or complete plan for the very thing desired than is comprehended in the series of recommendations now before us from the President of the United States?

Mr. MAPES. Not at all; and the Members of Congress who did the committee the honor to read its report all said it was a very fine report and one that ought to be adopted.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman from Michigan five more minutes.

Mr. MAPES. But that joint committee was confronted with the difficulties that everybody knows any committee will be confronted with, and that is the absolute impossibility of getting the average Member of Congress to take enough time or interest to study the situations until he realizes the merits of the proposals enough to resist these campaigns that are made by his friends who are going to be affected.

The President further said in this speech before the Chamber of Commerce in 1925:

Nor will we ever attain reorganization until Congress will give actual authority to the President or some board, if you will, or a committee of its own Members to do it. It is of no purpose to investigate again and report. We have had years of investigation and every investigation has resulted in some recommended action. Congressional committees have for many sessions, and even so late as the last session, reported out important recommendations. What is needed is the actual delegation of authority to act.

I have said that the President in every message he has made to Congress has recommended this reorganization program.

He started off with his acceptance speech on August 11, 1928. On June 6, 1929, in his message to Congress, he said:

In order to secure the utmost expedition in the reorganization and concentration of responsibility in administration of the Federal bureaus connected with prohibition enforcement, so greatly needed to improve their effectiveness, I recommend that the Congress appoint a joint select committee to make an immediate study of these matters and to formulate recommendations for consideration at the next regular session.

I shall be glad to appoint a committee from the departments to cooperate with such a committee of the Congress.

And in his message to Congress of December 3, 1929, he said—and I am only quoting the conclusion:

With this background of all previous experience I can see no hope for the development of a sound reorganization of the Government unless Congress be willing to delegate its authority over the problem (subject to defined principles) to the Executive, who should act upon approval of a joint committee of Congress or with the reservation of power of revision by Congress within some limited period adequate for its consideration.

In a statement to the press of July 8, 1930, he reiterated the same thought. In an Executive order of July 21, 1930, he made certain consolidations of the activities of the Government with respect to the veterans.

In his message to Congress of December 8, 1931, he said:

I have referred in previous messages to the profound need of further reorganization and consolidation of Federal administrative functions to eliminate overlap and waste, and to enable coordination and definition of Government policies now wholly impossible in scattered and conflicting agencies which deal with parts of the same major function. I shall lay before the Congress further recommendations upon this subject, particularly in relation to the Department of the Interior.

In this message he again recommends that the public building and construction activities be placed under one head, and in a statement to the press of December 29, 1931, he renewed the same thought and then again in his message which was read from the desk here yesterday afternoon he expressed the same purpose.

Oh, how impossible it is to attack the record of President Hoover on his reorganization program. How hard up the Democratic Party must be for an issue if it has got to rely upon its attempt to belittle the record of the present President of the United States in this respect. It can not be done. He has the record and it is not ridiculous as is the record of the Democratic Party on economy. He has a consistent and unimpeachable record of constructive and active recommendation and advocacy of this program for a period of over 12 years. [Applause.]

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. TILSON].

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] has made some rather sweeping charges here to-day, and by inference would have us believe even worse than he has charged directly. The purpose of his remarks seems to be to show that the Republican administration for the last 11 years has been wasteful and that the present President of the United States, both as President and as a Cabinet officer under the two preceding Presidents, has been wasteful as an official and inconsistent in connection with governmental consolidations so far as effecting economies is concerned. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] has effectively and thoroughly answered the gentleman's speech, so that I need refer to but a single point covered by the gentleman's charges.

On account of the President having been Secretary of Commerce for a period of over seven years preceding his election to the Presidency, the Department of Commerce is singled out by the gentleman from Tennessee as a special object of attack. He cites increased appropriations in this department and would have us infer that this means waste or extravagance. He barely mentions the transfer of two important bureaus from the Department of the Interior to the Department of Commerce; namely, the Patent Office and the Bureau of Mines; nor does he even mention the creating by Congress of two additional activities, the Radio Division and the Aeronautics Branch. No reference is made by the gentleman to these and other additional duties that have been imposed by Congress upon this department in response to the demands of business and the people generally for increased service.

The Bureau of Mines and the Patent Office were transferred to the Department of Commerce in 1925 by Executive order, while the Aeronautics Branch was created by law in 1926 and the Radio Division later.

In order to place the matter fairly before the committee, I wish to present a few facts in regard to the Department of Commerce during most of the period in which the present President of the United States was Secretary of Commerce. The figures given by the gentleman from Tennessee as to the total appropriations during these years would appear to confirm what the gentleman attempts to prove, that there had been a considerable increase.

Let us analyze the figures and then see what are the facts. At the beginning of the fiscal year July, 1922, there were 11,255 employees in the Department of Commerce. On July 1, 1929, a year after Mr. Hoover resigned from the Cabinet, there were 16,784 employees. On the face of it, this looks favorable to the gentleman's contention, but let us analyze it.

During this time there had been two large bureaus transferred from the Department of the Interior to the Department of Commerce, and Congress had created two new ones and had added additional duties, so that the total number of employees, instead of being increased by 5,389, as it would appear if proper deductions are made for the additional bureaus, the total personnel was increased by only 1,715, an increase of 15 per cent, or a little over 2 per cent during each year.

Now, take the Secretary's office, which includes the chief clerk's office, and the service divisions under it. In 1922 there were 183 employees. In 1928, when Mr. Hoover went out of office, there were 144 employees, or a reduction of 39 employees in the office immediately under the direction of Mr. Hoover as Secretary. Does this indicate a desire to expand extravagantly?

I have had prepared a table showing the changes in personnel in the various bureaus of this department between 1922 and 1928, as follows:

Office and number of employees

Secretary of Commerce:
1922	183
1928	144
A decrease of 39 employees.
Bureau of Census:
1922	1,664
1928	2,518

An increase of 854 employees due to the regular periodical taking of the census of agriculture and the census of manufactures—agriculture census every five years, manufactures census every two years.

Steamboat Inspection:
1922	366
1928	358
A decrease of 8 employees.
Bureau of Navigation:
1922	230
1928	166
A decrease of 64 employees.
Bureau of Standards:
1922	968
1928	900
A decrease of 68 employees.
Lighthouse Bureau:
1922	5,909
1928	5,905
A decrease of 4 employees.
Coast and Geodetic Survey:
1922	978
1928	991
An increase of 13 employees.
Bureau of Fisheries:
1922	462
An increase of 238 employees.

This increase is mainly due to the administration of the White Act of June 6, 1924, providing for protection of the salmon fisheries of Alaska, which were nearing exhaustion; aiding the States in conservation and administration of their fisheries; direct aid to the commercial fisheries in the solution of their problems of handling, preservation, and distribution of fishery products and the saving of the waste products of the fisheries; and organization of the Upper Mississippi Wild Life and Fish Refuge under an act approved June 7, 1924.

Patent Office: The Patent Office was brought into the Department of Commerce in 1925 with a personnel of 1,228; in 1928 it was 1,191, a decrease of 37 employees.

Bureau of Mines: The Bureau of Mines was brought into the Department of Commerce in 1925 with 971 employees; in 1928 there were 983, an increase of 12 employees.

Aeronautics Branch: The Aeronautics Branch was organized in 1926 with 164 employees; in 1928 it had grown to 538, an increase of 374 employees, due to the rapid growth of the industry and the necessity for increased governmental personnel to keep up its greatly expanded regulatory duties.

Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce:
1922	595

An increase of 874 employees.

The expansion in this bureau was primarily due to a very large increase in demands made upon the department for information regarding foreign economic conditions affecting American interests. Our stake abroad was greatly extended after the war through private investments which rose from eight billions in 1922 to nearly fourteen billions in 1928. Meantime our exports increased almost as heavily as did also such related lines as shipping, foreign branch factories, and so forth. As a consequence of this, the number of inquiries on such topics received by the department grew from 505,661 in the fiscal year 1921–22 to 2,770,773 in the year 1927–28. Incidentally, the work of meeting this tremendous new burden was so organized that the cost of handling each inquiry was cut from $2.38 in the beginning of the fiscal year 1922 to $1.34 in the fall of 1928. During this same period the number of inquiries handled by each employee of the bureau was increased more than 120 per cent. Perhaps the best evidence of the efficiency of this expansion is revealed in the actual results achieved in the field of trade promotion. Records on that point were begun in the fiscal year 1925–26 when voluntarily reported results of this type (orders secured and savings effected by reporting firms as the result of the department's services) totaled $7,319,323. In 1927–28 the total was $14,506,913. It should be carefully noted that these figures represent only those reported voluntarily by a small number of the firms actually assisted in this manner.

Briefly summarized, the foregoing figures show a total of 11,355 employees on July 1, 1922, and 15,963 on July 1, 1928, an increase of 4,608. Deducting from this figure the increase due to Patent Office, Bureau of Mines, and Aeronautics Branch, 2,712, there is an actual increase in the original bureaus in six years of 1,896 employees, or approximately 2½ per cent per year. The increase in all of the bureaus except Foreign and Domestic Commerce is at the rate of 1½ per cent a year.

There has been criticism that our Government is spending too much money on its foreign-trade-promotion activities, or in other words, on the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce—an organization built up and made most effective by the President when he was serving as Secretary of Commerce. Do you realize that America's expenditures on her foreign-trade promotion are not as large as those of our principal trade rivals? On a per capita basis our Canadian neighbors spend nearly twice as much as we do on the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce. On the basis of export figures American expenditures on trade promotion are only about 75 per cent of those of the British Department of Overseas Trade, an organization similar to our Foreign Commerce Bureau. Even Japan is spending more proportionately than the United States.

Although appropriations for the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce increased from $1,211,010 in the fiscal year 1921–22 to $3,721,957 in the fiscal year 1927–28—the period when Mr. Hoover was Secretary of Commerce—there was an increase of services rendered by that bureau from 505,661 to 2,770,773 as measured by the number of trade inquiries, which is a fair criterion. Likewise, during this period the cost per inquiry dropped from $2.38 in 1921–22, to $1.34 in 1927–28, or a decrease of 43 per cent. I am now informed that the cost per inquiry service during the past fiscal year has been further reduced to $1.28. This is fair evidence of economical administration.

Each year the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce attempts an evaluation of the results of the services it renders. For many years past this total, which is based on written statements of American firms, has continued to increase. Last year the report showed slightly in excess of $50,000,000. For the fiscal year 1930–31 the foreign trade of the United States shrank approximately 35 per cent in value. In spite of this unfavorable situation, the report for that year shows that American firms, as a result of the bureau's services, have received new business and direct savings to the extent of $57,554,813, a fine tribute to the efficiency of this particular bureau.

The gentleman from Tennessee did not venture to criticize in detail the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, though he did so in the aggregate; but the suggestion has been made that in the interests of economy it would be advisable to close some of the foreign offices of the Department of Commerce in view of the decline in the foreign trade of the United States. This would be a shortsighted policy, and such a move would be especially unfortunate at this particular time. It would be analogous to doing away with our military forces in times of peace. The demands being made upon the foreign offices of the Department of Commerce are greater than ever before. There are many American firms which have abolished their foreign offices and who are looking to the Department of Commerce for advice and information which was formerly furnished them through their own branches. If the foreign offices are closed, no one will be available to carry on the trade-promotion work they are doing; no one will keep American firms informed of financial, tariff, and legal developments which take place; and there would be no one to whom American business might turn for advice and assistance in entering foreign markets. British, French, German, and Italian firms would be greatly encouraged by this retreat of American effort in maintaining its foreign commercial position and would lose no time in impressing upon local business men that Americans are only interested in finding markets for surplus stock. All the effectiveness of the Government's foreign-trade service would be nullified at a time when it is most needed.

The Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce maintains the closet cooperation with industry, and all of its activities are the result of the insistent demands which have been made upon it. Many associations are cooperating in a financial way and during the past year industry has contributed over $1,500,000 to carry on some of the work which that bureau is doing. By far the larger part of this amount is in connection with the domestic-commerce activities of the department. We are in a period of readjustment of domestic business in which our business men are trying to find a profit by reducing costs instead of increasing volume. In this field business has found the Department of Commerce most helpful.

Upon a careful analysis of the facts, instead of indicating that there has been a wasteful increase in the Department of Commerce, it appears that the increase has been comparatively small, and that the results have fully justified the increase. [Applause.]

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TILSON. Yes.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Has there been any decrease in the number of employees of the House since the Democratic Party came into power?

Mr. TILSON. Not that anyone has noticed.

The gentleman from Tennessee complains of the commissions appointed by President Hoover. He, like every other President, has appointed commissions for the study of facts. Most of these are purely temporary in character. He overlooks the fact that during the present administration only 20 such commissions have been appointed by the President and that Congress has created 24; that of the committees appointed by the President 4 have been supported by Federal appropriations and that the others were purely voluntary and cost the Government nothing. During President Wilson's administration a total of 75 commissions of one kind or another were created by the President for similar purposes and as many more were appointed by Congress on its own motion. During the Coolidge administration 44 commissions were created for these purposes by the President and 74 were created by Congress on its own motion.

Under the leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD I propose to set out here certain facts relating to the appointment of public commissions in the past, because they are pertinent now in view of much partisan criticism of the present administration.

In a business so vast and complex as that of the Federal Government a large part of the research work necessarily is carried out by special commissions and committees delegated to investigate a given subject and to report to the President or to the Congress. They also act for the coordination of governmental activities, recommend policies, represent the Government abroad or at national functions, and exercise semijudicial or semilegislative powers delegated by the Congress.

A great majority of these commissions are created not by the President but by the Congress upon its own motion. All of the commissions created by the President are for temporary nonadministrative purposes as are also a large number of those created by the Congress.

The number of commissions set up under recent administrations are:

President Roosevelt	107
President Taft	63
President Wilson	150
President Harding	44
President Coolidge	118
President Hoover	44

The commissions, committees, or conferences are of three varieties:

First. Temporary bodies created by the President's order for the purpose of coordination of Government activities, or for the determination of facts and advice as to policies on special subjects. These commissions cost the Government nothing.

Second. Commissions or committees created by Congress upon recommendation of the President. The expenses of such committees are paid by appropriation.

Third. Commissions created by Congress on its own motion. These expenses are always paid by appropriation.

During President Wilson's administration approximately one-half of the total of 150 commissions were created by Congress upon its own motion. Of those created by or upon recommendations of the President, 10 are still in existence.

During the Coolidge administration, 74 commissions out of a total of 118 were created by Congress. Of the 44 created by the President or upon his recommendation, 39 have completed their tasks and have been released.

During President Hoover's administration 24 out of the 44 commissions were created by Congress. Of the 20 created directly by the President, or upon his recommendation, 12 have completed their tasks and have been released, and only 2 are other than temporary. Of the purely presidential commissions, the expenses of 4 have been paid by the Federal Government, while 17 either cost nothing or rely upon public support.

The following are the commissions or committees created under the present administration, classified as those created by Executive order, those created by Congress upon recommendation of the President, and those created by Congress upon its own motion.

COMMISSIONS CREATED BY EXECUTIVE ORDER

First. Committee on Coordination of Veterans' Services: This was an interdepartmental committee and the result of its investigation and report was the consolidation of all veterans' services into the new Veterans' Administration, with the result of an annual saving in expenditures of fully $10,000,000. The committee has completed its work and has been dismissed.

Second. Advisory Shipping Committee: This committee was appointed to advise upon the sale of certain steamship lines by the Government and the reorganization of others. The policies recommended have been followed with success. The committee has completed its work and has been dismissed.

Third. California Water Commission: This commission was created in conjunction with the Governor of California for the coordination of State and Federal activities in water problems of the State of California. It has cost the Federal Government nothing. The commission has completed its work and has been dismissed.

Fourth. National Drought Committee: This committee was appointed to coordinate Federal, State, and other activities in the matter of drought relief and to recommend a national program. The result of its investigation was recommendations which led to the undertaking of relief by the Red Cross and appropriations by Congress for rehabilitation of agriculture from the drought. It represents no expenditure. The committee has completed its work and has been dismissed.

Fifth. San Francisco Bridge Commission: This commission was appointed in conjunction with the Governor of California to settle the conflict between Federal and State authorities in determination of the location of a bridge across San Francisco Bay. The commission settled this question, which had been a matter of public dispute for over 10 years, and preparations are being made for the construction of the bridge. The commission cost the Federal Government nothing. It has completed its work and has been dismissed.

Sixth. Advisory Committee on Veterans' Preference: This committee was set up to determine policies with respect to employment of disabled veterans and the method of preference to be given by Government departments. It made a report, and Executive order has been issued placing the recommendatitons in action. The committee has completed its work and has been dismissed.

Seventh. Advisory Commission on Unemployment Statistics: This commission was appointed to advise the method by which unemployment statistics should be recruited by the Department of Labor under authority of Congress requiring the establishment of such service. The committee has made its recommendations and they have been placed in action and the committee dissolved. The committee has cost the Government nothing.

Eighth. Emergency Unemployment Committee: This committee was created to coordinate Government activities in employment programs in the depression and secure organization of committees throughout the country through adequate organization of local agencies to take care of distress during the depression. It made an effective contribution to the situation.

Ninth. Interdepartmental Mail Contract Committee: This commission was appointed to coordinate the activities of the Department of Commerce, the Shipping Board, the Army, and Navy in respect to marine mail contracts. It has passed upon and negotiated postal and other contracts, which have resulted in agreements for the construction of nearly 500,000 tons of merchant ships. It is still functioning but costs the Government nothing.

Tenth. Research Committee on Social Trends: This committee is engaged in research into various social questions which bear on immigration, hours of labor, and many kindred subjects. Its expenditures are being met by the Rockefeller Foundation.

Eleventh. White House Conference on Child Health and Protection: This committee conducted investigations into child health and protection and directed the White House conference on that subject, and is engaged in follow-up activities throughout the country. Its expenditures have been met by the A. R. A. children's fund and there has been no expense to the Government. It has made a notable contribution to the welfare of children in coordination of National, State, and local activities. The conference has completed its task except publications.

Twelfth. White House Conference on Home Building and Ownership: This committee is engaged in exhaustive investigation of housing conditions, financial and other methods for extension of home building and home ownership. Its expenses are being paid by private subscription and it costs the Government nothing.

Thirteenth. Advisory committee on illiteracy: This committee was created to coordinate the activities of the Federal Government with State governments and private agencies throughout the country in the elimination of illiteracy. It has carried on active campaigns, organized schools for adults, and has greatly contributed to the elimination of illiteracy. It has been supported by private subscription.

Fourteenth. Council of Personnel Administration: This is purely an interdepartmental committee to establish standards in Federal Government employment.

Fifteenth. Advisory Committee on Education: This committee is engaged in exhaustive study of problems of coordinating the different Government activities together with those of the States and municipalities in questions of education. The committee's expenditures are being paid by the Rosenwald Foundation.

Sixteenth. Timber Conservation Board: This committee was created to study and advise on forestry policies with view to coordination of Federal, State, and private activities in conservation. It is supported by private subscription.

Seventeenth. Anti-Hoarding Committee: This committee was created by the President in volunteer cooperation with leading business and civic organizations of the country for the purpose of stopping the hoarding of money during the economic depression. It cost the Federal Government nothing.

Eighteenth. Committee on Abandoned Army Posts: This committee is made up of departmental officials; was appointed to devise means of utilizing Army posts abandoned in the War Department retrenchment program and cost the Federal Government nothing.

Nineteenth. Committee for the Study of Education in Haiti: This committee was appointed by the Secretary of State and consists of prominent educators in the United States. It is making a study with a view to improving the educational system in Haiti.

Twentieth. The President's Unemployment Relief Organization: This commission was set up under Walter S. Gifford as director to cooperate with the States and municipalities in devising ways and means for the relief of unemployment during the winter of 1931–32. It took over the work of the Emergency Unemployment Committee which was set up at the outset of the economic depression and has made a very distinctive contribution in the relief of the whole unemployment situation.

COMMITTEES CREATED BY CONGRESS UPON RECOMMENDATION OF THE PRESIDENT

Twenty-first. London Naval Conference: This commission negotiated and completed a naval treaty for the limitation of navies. It has saved hundreds of millions of dollars to the American taxpayer and secured parity to the American Navy and brought about better international relationship to both Japan and Great Britain.

Twenty-second. Federal Power Commission: This commission is a reorganization of the previous departmental commission in order to secure more expeditious and independent action than hitherto. It requires no additional expenditure except for salaries of commissioners.

Twenty-third. The Haitian Commission: This commission settled the terms of the withdrawal of the United States from Haiti and set up such arrangements within that island as prevented further revolution. This commission has completed its task and has been dismissed.

Twenty-fourth. National Commission on Law Observance and Enforcement: This commission has made exhaustive reports on the whole problem of law enforcement and the reorganization of the law enforcement machinery and the judiciary of the country. The commission in a report said that "Federal participation in enforcement has shown continued improvement since and as a consequence of the act of Congress of 1927 placing prohibition officers under civil service, and the act of 1930 transferring prohibition enforcement from the Treasury to the Department of Justice."

Twenty-fifth. Commission on Conservation and Administration of Public Domain: This commission has made a report on the conservation of western lands and ranges and recommendations for management and disposal of public lands. Its report has been completed and has been submitted to Congress.

Twenty-sixth. The Federal Farm Board: This commission was proposed by both the Republican and Democratic Conventions and was recommended by the President for the relief of agriculture. It is permanent and is designed to aid cooperative organizations of farmers to market their crops.

Twenty-seventh. Reconstruction Finance Corporation: This organization was created by the Congress, upon recommendation of the President, with assets of $2,000,000,000 to assist in the reconstruction of the normal working of the credit fabric of the country with a view to aiding agriculture and industry in obtaining normal conditions. It is temporary in character.

Twenty-eighth. Geneva Arms Limitation Conference: This commission was created by the President, with expenses provided for by the Congress, for American participation in the General Arms Limitation Conference which began in Geneva in February, 1932.

Twenty-ninth. Tariff Commission: This commission is a reorganization of that provided for under the tariff act of 1922. Reorganization both in personnel and methods provided for by the Congress in the tariff act of 1930 was made in order to secure more expeditious action in investigating and increasing or lowering tariff duties to meet changing economic conditions.

PUBLIC COMMISSIONS CREATED BY CONGRESS UPON ITS OWN MOTION

Thirtieth. Interoceanic Canal Board: This board is engaged in a survey of the Nicaraguan Canal.

Thirty-first. Massachusetts Bay Colony Tercentenary Commission: This commission represented the Federal Government in the celebration in Massachusetts. This commission has completed its task and has been dismissed.

Thirty-second. National Memorial Commission: This commission was created by Congress for the erection of a building as tribute to the negro achievements in America.

Thirty-third. Iceland—one thousandth anniversary of the Althing: Commission created by Congress to attend the celebration representing the American Government. The commission has completed its task and has been dismissed.

Thirty-fourth. Yellowstone National Park Boundary Commission: This commission was created to settle the boundaries of Yellowstone National Park. It has completed its work and its report and recommendations sent to the Congress.

Thirty-fifth. Alaska Highway Commission: This commission was created by Congress to make a preliminary survey of the highway from Continental United States to Alaska.

Thirty-sixth. Chicago World's Fair Centennial Celebration: Commission created by Congress to investigate and report with reference to the Federal Government's representation and participation in the celebration. Its report is now before Congress.

Thirty-seventh. Joint Committee to Investigate Pay Readjustment of Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, and Geodetic Survey and Public Health Service.

Thirty-eighth. Universal draft commission: Public Resolution No. 98 (71st Cong.). Commission to study promotion of peace, equalization of burdens of war, and minimization of profits of war.

Thirty-ninth. District of Columbia fiscal relations: This committee to make full investigation of fiscal relations of the District of Columbia and the United States Government and to report its recommendations to the House.

Fortieth. Charleston, S. C., celebration of two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of founding.

Forty-first. Lewis and Clarke expedition celebration.

Forty-second. Joint committee to investigate Northern Pacific grants.

Forty-third. Joint committee to attend sesquicentennial celebration of Battle of Kings Mountain, S. C.

Forty-fourth. United States Battle of the Monongahela commission.

A careful study of this long list of commissions, boards, and committees heretofore appointed to find facts and help to formulate policies, will completely disprove the oft-repeated charge that the present administration has embarked upon a new or untried policy of dealing with great public problems.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. SHANNON].

Mr. SHANNON. Mr. Chairman, I am in no sense a militarist. However, no matter how much we may hope for peace we can not be blind or deaf to what is going on in the world in the way of preparing for war—hence, the importance of giving heed to the views of those who have in the past rendered services to this country in times of war and who now, although in civil life, give freely of their time from business, without compensation, to prepare for any national emergency that may arise.

I have here a statement prepared by Maj. Robert W. Reed, at the instance of the Kansas City Chapter of the Reserve Officers' Association, which I wish to place in the RECORD. I think it is a convincing statement.

The Kansas City Chapter of the Reserve Officers' Association is made up of the best of the community's citizenry.

KANSAS CITY, MO., February 15, 1932.

Hon. JOSEPH B. SHANNON,
Member of Congress, House Office Building,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SHANNON: The Kansas City Chapter, Reserve Officers' Association, has authorized me, by unanimous vote, to lay before you its views on legislation pertaining to national defense. I do this with the knowledge that you have some understanding of our situation here—the work we are doing and the caliber of the personnel in our chapter. We feel that your visit with us—a most pleasurable one—has given you an insight into what patriotically interested citizens are doing chiefly by voluntary effort. In fact I might add that my own view of it is that the Government should not fail to support such activities if for no other reason than to encourage the joining together of high-minded citizens in unselfish support of the Government itself—men who would not have to but are ready to meet any emergency in which their services may be of some value.

Our organization is not advocating a big army nor any change in the already inaugurated military policy of the United States as arrived at by the Congress and set forth in the national defense act. Our interests—and I speak for more than 300 men here in Kansas City—primarily are those of taxpayers and citizens, not of professional soldiers.

The members of our chapter do believe, however, that in the present unsettled condition of world relations, it would be most unwise to reduce the already slender Military Establishment. Many members of the association have seen for themselves, in cantonment, camp, and field, the cost in human lives that is paid when a nation almost totally uninstructed in defense is suddenly hurled into war. It is our belief that leadership, instructed in time of peace, can save many thousands of lives in time of war. The Regular Army is not large enough to supply all of the required leadership; most of it will have to come from the civilian sources. Moreover, this is perhaps wiser in a democracy such as ours, because it prevents the growth of a powerful military caste.

Officers and enlisted men of the Regular Army are being used in a valuable manner to-day to give instruction to the civilian components. But this assistance, which has mutual advantages, will be wiped out if some of the proposals which have been submitted to the Congress are adopted.

In view of the present situation, therefore, I have been asked to lay before you the following points for your consideration:

1. The Regular Army, in both commissioned and enlisted strength, should be kept at its present figure. If it is reduced, it will mean that no personnel will be available for duty with the civilian components. It is our belief that the sending of men from the Regular Army to the civilian components does more than provide merely military training for the citizens interested; it also brings members of the Regular Army into closer contact with the community at large and the views of the everyday citizen.

2. The reserve officers should receive active duty as often as possible for short periods. This is much more valuable than the study of theories and lessons by the correspondence method. The appropriation set aside in the Budget for this purpose is not too large.

3. With the Regular Army greatly reduced and required to cover so many varying assignments, the National Guard has become virtually the "first line" of land defense. It, too, should continue to be supported with appropriations giving its personnel ample camp and armory drill training opportunities.

4. Those who have seen the citizens' military training camps in operation know that they are doing a valuable work. In this year, when so many young men are coming from the schools and colleges to find no immediate jobs available, the camps should not be abandoned, but perhaps even extended to meet the situation.

5. Likely material for junior officers must be found if the military policy already mentioned is to be successful. The best source for these is in the Reserve Officers' Training Corps units of schools and colleges. We believe that a reduction or suspension of this activity would be unwise.

In addition to the above, it is our feeling that the proposal to unite the Army and Navy in one department will not bring about the desired efficiency, and might lead to serious complications in the event of a great national emergency.

Most sincerely,

ROBERT W. REED,
Major A. G.-Res., President Kansas City
Chapter Reserve Officers' Association.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. HASTINGS].

Mr. HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, next to agriculture, the oil industry is the principal one in my State of Oklahoma, and we are very much interested in any legislation that will favorably affect it. The oil industry has been in a very depressed condition for the past few years.

It is estimated that there are approximately 330,000 oil wells in the United States and that of these 300,000 produce on an average only 4.7 barrels of oil per day. The danger is that when the industry is demoralized by ruinously low prices the pumping of thousands of small wells may have to be discontinued and the oil that might have been produced from these wells is forever lost.

The price of oil has fluctuated from $1.45 per barrel to as low as 10 cents per barrel during the summer months of 1931. Of course, oil can not be produced at such ruinously low prices. Every effort has been made to assist the industry. Some three years ago we appealed to Congress for a tariff on oil. Members of the House are familiar with the hearings held at that time, both before the Ways and Means Committee of the House and the Finance Committee of the Senate.

The producers of oil, particularly in the areas where the largest amount of oil is produced, have held numerous conferences and entered into various agreements to pinch in their wells and to reduce the production. As a result production of oil has been greatly curtailed throughout the United States.

At the suggestion of the oil producers and with their approval the Governors of Oklahoma and Texas enforced agreements to prorate oil production through martial law. The price of oil has responded, until it is now around 77 cents per barrel, but that is below the cost of production.

Mr. MANLOVE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HASTINGS. Yes.

Mr. MANLOVE. Is not part of that reduction due, in fact, to the action of the Governor of Oklahoma in closing down the oil wells?

Mr. HASTINGS. I have referred to that and just said that it was done with the approval of the oil people, and that he brought the price up around 77 cents a barrel.

Four of the larger companies are importing oil and refined products into this country. Appeals have been made to them to reduce their importations. The complaint of the oil producers is that these companies have not been reducing their importations in the same proportion as the domestic producers have curtailed the output of their wells.

In 1930 the oil and refined products imported into this country aggregated around 105,510,000 barrels, which was more than one-eighth of 898,011,000 barrels, the amount of oil produced in the United States.

It was urged before the Ways and Means Committee that the amount of oil and refined products imported into this country approximated about 10 per cent of the total production in this country and that this percentage is not sufficient to unfavorably affect the price of oil and refined products in the domestic market.

The answer to such a contention is that the amount of wheat produced in the United States during the year 1930 was 898,011,000 bushels. The amount imported, upon which a duty was paid, was 21,000 bushels. The duty wheat imported for that year was one-forty-fifth of 1 per cent of the wheat produced.

Let us examine corn. We produced 2,060,185,000 bushels of corn in the United States in 1930. We imported 1,554,971 bushels. This was a very small fractional part of 1 per cent of the amount produced—about one-thirteenth of 1 per cent—a negligible amount.

This negligible percentage, to a measurable degree, applies to many manufactured products imported into this country. However, there was a duty of 42 cents per bushel placed upon wheat and 25 cents per bushel placed on corn imported into this country.

Let me emphasize that there is being imported approximately 10 per cent as much oil and refined products as is produced in this country.

When we were trying to get relief by having a tariff duty placed on oil and refined products during the last session of Congress a resolution was passed directing the Tariff Commission to study the difference between the cost of producing oil in Venezuela and in the United States. The report of the commission shows that it has been found that this difference amounts to $1.03 per barrel.

The Committee on Ways and Means is searching with a financial microscope for every additional source of revenue that can be found. Our expenditures during the last fiscal year exceeded our revenues by $903,000,000. It is estimated that our revenues will fall short of our expenditures by more than $2,000,000,000 during the coming fiscal year, and this committee is trying to raise an additional billion dollars in revenue.

There are certain admitted sources of revenue including a graduation of the income tax in the higher brackets, which everyone favors. The committee is undertaking a most difficult job. Protests are coming into the committee and Members of Congress against increasing our taxes on many subjects.

Here is an industry that is in dire distress. It has been suggested that an excise tax of 2 cents per gallon on imported oil and an excise tax of 4 cents per gallon on imported gasoline and a corresponding tax on other imported refined products would raise approximately $100,000,000. This would relieve the committee of great embarrassment, because it would not have to impose taxes on many other subjects.

On the basis of the amount imported into this country in 1930—crude oil 62,129,000 barrels and refined products 43,489,000—the estimated amount of $100,000,000 levied as an excise tax would have been collected.

It is urged, both before the Ways and Means Committee and through the press of the country, that if an excise tax of 2 cents per gallon on crude petroleum and 4 cents per gallon on gasoline and a corresponding tax on other refined products imported into this country would result in no importations and that no revenue would be collected.

We submit that there are two answers to this argument:

First. The Tariff Commission found that the difference between the cost of producing crude oil in Venezuela and in this country is $1.03 per barrel, and therefore a tax of 84 cents per barrel would not result in greatly reducing the importation of oil and refined products.

The oil area in Venezuela is being rapidly extended and proven, and oil will continue to be produced now that added facilities have been brought to that country at a lower rate than heretofore. It costs more to pipe crude oil from the mid-continent field to the Atlantic seaboard than it does to produce oil in the Venezuela field and ship it to the same points.

Refineries are being enlarged in Venezuela, where great quantities of oil will be refined, and we may expect that much greater quantities of refined products will be imported into the United States.

Second. Conceding that there would be decreased importations of crude oil and refined products which would result in the collection of a reduced amount in revenue, let me invite attention to the fact that the levying of this excise tax would stabilize the oil industry in our own country, and the Government would collect a far greater amount from income and inheritance and other taxes than it would lose because of reduced importations of oil and refined products.

There is no overproduction of oil in the United States if the domestic market is retained to domestic producers. The domestic producers, however, can not produce oil and compete with those companies importing oil from the Venezuelan field. This oil is imported by four of the larger companies—the Dutch Shell Co., the Gulf Oil Corporation, the Standard Oil Co. of New Jersey, and the Standard Oil Co. of Indiana.

Now everyone, in addition to the members of the oil fraternity in my State of Oklahoma, is deeply interested in the protection of the oil industry. It pays to our State a 3 per cent gross-production tax on all oil produced in the State. The proceeds from this tax in a large measure maintain our State government.

In 1926, taxes collected by the State of Oklahoma from this source amounted to $10,483,348.99, and the taxes for the following years, which have been collected by the State, are $11,476,851.40 for the year 1927, $10,063,957.57 for the year 1928, $10,426,263.50 for the year 1929, $8,816,372.76 for the year 1930, and $4,332,123.60 for the year 1931.

This reduction in the amount of taxes collected from this source has had a very serious effect upon the revenues of our State.

Fifty per cent of this tax, including penalties, goes to the general revenue fund of the State, 33⅓ per cent of the tax goes to the counties producing the oil, and 16⅔ per cent goes to the aid of the weak schools of the State.

It will readily be seen, therefore, how the reduction in the price of oil affects the revenues of our State.

During periods of depression in the oil industry there is no new development for oil. When the industry is prosperous, leases are taken in new territory far removed from producing fields. Thousands of additional acres are leased. The farmers are paid rentals for the leasing of their lands that enables them to pay their taxes and other expenses, but during times of depression this new development is discontinued. The farmers are therefore very deeply interested in the welfare of the oil industry.

The depression in the oil industry greatly affects the employment situation in my State of Oklahoma. It is estimated there are now 100,000 men out of employment in Oklahoma.

It is urged, as one of the arguments against legislation levying an import tax against oil and gas and other products, that it will increase the price of gasoline to the ultimate consumer, but I leave it to the experience of every purchaser of gasoline that there has been little difference in the cost of gasoline and other refined products during the past three years, when the price of oil has fluctuated from $1.45 per barrel to as low as 10 cents per barrel. The price of gasoline during all that time has remained practically the same. Its selling price varies in the several States because of the difference in State taxes. In Oklahoma this State tax on gasoline is now 4 cents per gallon. In some States it is 3 cents per gallon, and, I believe, goes as high as 7 cents per gallon in Florida.

During the past three years there has been no appreciable difference in the price of gasoline to the ultimate consumer, and this is also true as to the cost of lubricating oil. The consumer pays around 25 or 30 cents per quart for this kind of oil, whether the price of oil is high or low. The truth is the price of gasoline and other refined products of petroleum is commercially controlled and has little relation to the price of crude petroleum itself.

The imposition of an excise tax on imported oil and refined products will not only add to the prosperity of the oil industry but to those engaged in mining coal and in other lines of business depending upon the prosperity of those engaged in the production, manufacture, sale, and distribution of oil and its refined products.

When we are searching for every method of taxation let me emphasize to the committee that the levying of an import tax on gasoline and the other refined products of petroleum will not only bring in about $100,000,000 in additional revenue and relieve the committee from taxing other lines of industry, but it will contribute much to the restoration of prosperity to one of the greatest industries in our country, which is in almost a death struggle for existence. The imposition of such an import tax will enable my State of Oklahoma to realize more on account of its gross production tax on oil produced in the State, will lower the local and State taxes to the people, assist the schools of the State, and will encourage leasing of additional territory, and in that way be of benefit to the farmers of the State, and will give employment to thousands of the unemployed in the oil industry and will be a great relief to the people of the country generally.

Mr. SHREVE. I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, I rise to call attention to a most novel labor situation existing in the Middle West and the Far West. It is the first time in the history of labor that airplane pilots have been locked out. It would present a very interesting situation except for the fact of the tremendous dangers to the public involved. The profession of piloting an airplane, and particularly a passenger plane, requires the highest degree of skill and a great deal of experience. Congress passed a law placing in the Department of Commerce jurisdiction over equipment and personnel.

The Department of Commerce, in the light of experience which we have in this new method of transportation, has promulgated rules and requirements for commercial aviators, and it is working out, with a few exceptions, rather satisfactorily. Naturally, as we gain more experience, the rules and requirements will be changed from time to time. I hope it will not be necessary to change the present system of regulations. The Department of Commerce must realize and always bear in mind that their regulation and enforcement must be for the public interest and not for the convenience of operating companies.

A few days ago there appeared in the Capitol a gentleman—I believe he is the president of the Century Air Lines (Inc.). If I am not mistaken, he had a conference or a hearing with members of the Committee on Appropriations and stated that he would be willing to have his company carry air mails for 50 per cent less than is now being paid to operators having contracts with the Post Office Department. The members of the committee who spoke with him were naturally interested and gave him a courteous hearing, as they always do to any citizen having business with the committee. Then this gentleman—and I refer to a certain Mr. Cord, president of the Century Air Lines (Inc.)—went back to Chicago, called in his pilots, and slashed their wages 40 per cent; and in the course of the negotiations told the pilots he was going "to take the romance out of aviation" and bring down the salary of pilots to $125 a month. Imagine attempting to get licensed, experienced, and trustworthy pilots transporting passengers in the air for less than $30 a week, less than a union truck driver gets in the city of New York.

Then this man announced a lockout, discharged all the pilots, and advertised for new pilots. Many Members of the House have taken an interest in this situation and have communicated with the Department of Commerce, and the Department of Commerce has dispatched their inspectors to Chicago and other points to check on the men employed, as to their qualifications. I am in contact with the Department of Commerce and I think we will be able to prevent attempts of this company in getting Government inspectors to go to out-of-the-way places and secretly check unfit men. A record should be made, kept, and published of who these men are, because you can readily see the danger of putting inexperienced men in charge of passenger planes, not alone for the passengers but for the people on the ground below.

The gentleman who is going to take the "romance out of aviation," I am reliably informed, has placed an armed guard in every plane, right back of the flyer. Just what the purpose is no one knows. Imagine the state of mind of a pilot attempting to operate a plane under such condition. The guards employed are of the usual type and character generally used as strike breakers or scab guards. Now, some will say that such a statement is exaggerated. I will say that the management of this company presents a very low order of citizen, judging from past performances. Permit me to read a letter written last May by this company in the course of preparation for this strike and in the course of the company's competition with other companies. I have in my hand a photostatic copy of a letter, the original of which is in our possession, written by the general manager of Century Air Lines (Inc.), addressed to George H. Pfeuffer, their own terminal manager at Detroit, Mich. It reads:

DEAR SIR: Any number of people, including executives of the Cord Corporation, have advised me that Thompson—is making a practice of telling our passengers who are on the bus with their passengers on the 1.30 schedule that they should ask for refund of their ticket and get out on the first ship, which is Thompson's, and that you have no hesitancy in refunding their money to them so that they can do this.

I can not understand why it should be necessary for anyone to tell you not to permit this, but rather arrange to offset it and, if possible, give Thompson a dose of their own medicine; but it seems that some one must tell everybody just what to do.

Why don't you get some good hard-boiled scrapper and ride him on that bus all day long. If he hears anyone making a suggestion to any passenger about Thompson, have this tough beat him up. It was necessary to do this in the early railroad days and also in the taxicab and bus developments and apparently it is necessary for us to adopt this sort of tactics.

Get after this situation right now and let me hear from you what has been done about it.

Then it is signed W. F. Bliss, their manager.

Mr. MAAS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. MAAS. This is the same organization that was after the air mail contracts?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Yes, sir. They reduced their pilots, as I said, 40 per cent, and are attempting to bring down licensed experienced pilots, in charge of human life, to a wage of $125 a month. This is the same company the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MAAS] has investigated and has filed complaints against with the Secretary of Commerce.

Now, gentleman, Mr. Cord may have taken the romance out of aviation, but he has put the undertaker in aviation; and now I am sure the gentlemen of the House who have and are taking an active interest in the development of aviation will all agree that such conditions must not exist in commercial aviation and that it is quite proper we should advise the traveling public to stay off Century planes until such time as experienced competent pilots are replaced on their ships. Mr. Cord might as well know that if he is conducting this strike on gangster-thug methods, as indicated in the letter I have just quoted, and if he expects that citizens paying fares are going to be in danger of being beaten up, according to the written instructions in their own letter, and pay pilots less than the prevailing rate of the profession, he may never hope to have a contract as long as this low type of individuals are in charge of the Century Air Lines or any other operating airplane company. [Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SHALLENBERGER].

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Mr. Chairman, the measure under consideration is the appropriation bill of the Department of Commerce. The development of trade and commerce is dependent upon two vital factors—money and credit. The business prosperity of the Nation rests upon the confidence of the people in our banking system, since the banks are the chief sources of supply of both credit and money.

For this reason the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], one of the recognized leaders of this House, has introduced a bill to provide for the insurance of bank deposits. I also have introduced a bill along similar lines and for the same general purpose. I trust that the Committee on Banking and Currency is giving this matter very serious consideration. I know of no question in which the people of the country are more concerned than that of the safety and security of their money and the availability of credit.

Something more substantial than a proclamation against hoarding is required to bring the money now in hiding back into the banks and turn it again into the channels of trade.

Congress a short time ago passed a bill creating a $2,000,000,000 financial reconstruction corporation, in an effort to improve the credit of our financial institutions, railroads, industry, and agriculture. The reason given for the legislation was that continued financial and commercial disaster has shattered the confidence of the people. The feeling of fear for the future in the public mind is at the bottom of our business troubles. Until general confidence in our financial institutions is restored, little business improvement can be hoped for and prosperity will continue to be "just around the corner."

The prosperity of the Nation is based upon the full use and movement of the people's money, and that depends upon the confidence of the people in our banking system.

The present debacle in business and banking is not a new thing in the economic history of our country. During the years 1837, 1857, 1873, 1893, and 1907 American banks, business, and commercial institutions went through a similar collapse.

Must we always live in dread of the return of panics? Shall American business and finance continue to face the future with fear, or with the courage born of confidence in the safety of our financial institutions?

Banks are now undergoing a severe test as to their ability to serve as safe reservoirs of money and credit and to meet successfully the business crisis that confronts the country. In the past 10 years more than 7,800 banks in the United States have failed, with deposits of over $2,500,000,000. This is an appalling fact. In the year just ended, 2,290 banks closed their doors, with deposits of over $1,750,000,000. These figures are enough to show the staggering blow that the Nation's business has suffered.

BANKING IN BRITAIN

We borrowed our language and our form of government from Great Britain. We still speak the language of Britain, but our laws are not so well enforced, nor have our banks been as safe for depositors as those of our English-speaking brethren.

A short comparison of our banking history with theirs discloses a decided difference in results. Canada, our neighbor on the north, has had but one bank failure in the past 10 years. During this century England has not had a bank suspend, and Scotland has not known a bank failure in a hundred years.

The tremendous fall in commodity prices since the war is one of the chief causes of our many bank failures. Government taxation also takes too large a toll from our national income, and these two causes breed bank failures and bankruptcy. But Britain and Canada have suffered a deflation and shrinkage in commodity prices even more drastic than our own. The burden of taxation which banking and business must bear is much more severe in Britain than in America. Where a citizen of this Republic must contribute $1,000 in taxes upon his income for the support of his Government, the Englishman pays many times as much into his Nation's treasury.

A study of results from liquidation of failed banks in past years shows the comparative looseness of our banking methods and consequent losses to depositors in banks. A statement to me from the Comptroller of the Currency shows that from 1865 to 1929, 70 per cent of proven claims have been paid to creditors of our failed national banks. The average per cent paid to creditors of national banks fully liquidated, for the years 1930 and 1931, was but 50½ per cent of claims of depositors.

Prior to 1915, eight Canadian banks failed. Six of these banks paid note holders and depositors in full and one is still in liquidation. Only one Canadian bank, which closed in 1908, resulted in loss to its creditors.

Since there have been no bank failures in England or Scotland, there have been no losses to depositors in those countries, no hoarding of money, nor runs on their financial institutions.

DEPOSITORS' INSURANCE NECESSARY

Unless we provide for better protection of bank depositors against loss, we will be forced to go to the British system of a limited number of powerful central banks with a multitude of branches supplying the need for local banking facilities throughout the country.

A Federal insurance law would protect depositors in the banks of the reserve system only. To enjoy the protection and benefits of such a law a State bank would have to become a member of the Federal system. This is a requirement easily fulfilled. A provision for insurance of depositors in member banks was included in the Federal reserve act when it passed the Senate in December, 1913. This provision was included in the Senate bill through the efforts of Senators Hitchcock, of Nebraska; Williams, of Mississippi; Thomas, of Colorado; and others. The insurance section was eliminated while the bill was in conference.

I will read some short extracts from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD while the reserve bill was under consideration.

Senator Hitchcock, of Nebraska, said:

[From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, December 17, 1913]

Mr. President, the provision in either of these bills is similar, although the bill which I have reported is, I think, better, that after the payment of the expense of the member and the reserve banks, after the payment of dividends, after the accumulation each year of a surplus, the remaining profits instead of being given to the stockholders, who are not entitled to them, instead of being paid to the Government of the United States, which is already sufficiently recompensed, shall be paid into an insurance fund for the protection of those depositors of failed banks who would otherwise lose their money.

That is not a tax on the judicious banker; it is not a burden upon the people of the United States. It is simply using some of the profits to pay depositors who, unfortunately, have had their money in banks which for some reason have failed in spite of the legislation of Congress.

Senator Thomas, of Colorado, said:

[From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, December 23, 1913, the day the Federal reserve act was adopted]

Mr. President, I have been greatly disappointed that the conference committee struck from the bill that part of section 7 which was designed to create an insurance fund for the benefit of depositors in failed member banks. My disappointment is modified in some degree by the assurances which are given by members of the Senate conference committee that it is the intention of the Banking and Currency Committee of both Houses to present a more mature and better-designed system of depositors' insurance.

Senator Owen said:

[From the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, December 23, 1913]

The House committee is preparing a special bill on the plan of insuring bank deposits. They have a subcommittee especially charged with that duty.

Former Secretary of the Treasury McAdoo, who advocated the insurance provision in the original Federal reserve act, in his book Crowded Years states:

The bill as reported to the Senate by Senator Owen contained a provision for insuring deposits of member banks. The insurance fund was to be administered under the supervision of the Secretary of the Treasury. Into this fund there was to be paid a certain percentage of net earnings for the benefit of depositors in failed member banks.

It was a mistake, I thought, to eliminate the depositors' insurance feature. One of the greatest reforms, as well as one of the greatest blessings, that could be achieved would be an organization that would save depositors from loss no matter what happens to the bank. It may be argued that the unusual number of bank failures in the past few years condemns insurance of deposits as unsound. I do not agree with this view. If the banks had been members of the reserve system, they would have been more effectively supervised and the number of failures much less.

On this point it is interesting to note that of the 2,290 banks that closed in 1931, 1,772 were nonmember banks.

The depositors' insurance section that was stricken from the Senate bill in conference provided that after 6 per cent interest was paid upon the stock of the reserve banks, one-half of the remaining profit should go into a surplus fund—one-fourth be paid to the United States as a franchise tax and one-fourth be used for the establishment of a depositors' insurance fund.

RECORDS OF PAST LIQUIDATIONS

It is interesting to note what would have resulted had the insurance fund provision remained in the law. Up to and including the year 1930 the total net earnings of the reserve banks was $523,204,165. Of that amount, 6 per cent, or $100,941,058, as required by law, was paid in dividends upon stock, $147,126,000 was paid as a franchise tax to the Government, and $275,136,000 was put into a surplus fund.

It has been impossible for me to learn the total losses to creditors in failed national banks for the years 1930 and 1931, but the Comptroller of the Currency has made a report showing the loss to depositors—from the enactment of national banking law in 1862 down to and including the year 1929. During these years the Nation suffered from the panics of 1873, 1893, 1907, and the deflation of 1921. During these 67 years 1,241 national banks were placed in receivership. They held deposits of $261,205,000 when closed. The sum of $193,279,863 has been paid to creditors on proven claims against these banks, leaving a total loss to depositors in failed national banks in 67 years of $67,925,702.

All proven losses to depositors in failed national banks since 1862 could have been paid from the surplus fund of the Federal reserve system and still leave multiplied millions for any possible emergency. Had the insurance provision been retained in the law our national banking system would stand to-day like a financial Gibraltar against the storm that now shakes our business structure to its very center.

But the Federal reserve bank surplus earnings is not our only lawful source of supply for a depositors' insurance fund. The Nebraska guaranty law, which was twice sustained by our State and Federal supreme courts, required a semi-annual payment of one-twentieth of 1 per cent of their total deposits into a fund to insure depositors against loss. This provision is carried in both Mr. LAGUARDIA's bill and my own. A similar tax levied on the thirty-three billions on deposit in member banks on June 30 last would produce the sum of $33,000,000 annually for the support of a depositors' insurance fund. In 10 years this levy would provide an insurance fund of more than $330,000,000—an amount greater than the determined loss to depositors in national banks up to date.

There is still another source that could be fairly and justly drawn upon to help build a sufficient depositors' insurance fund. On September 29 last there was $10,000,000,000 of time and savings deposits in member banks. The general rate of interest paid on such deposits is 3 per cent per annum. Time depositors might well contribute to the insurance of their funds against loss by bank failures, and I believe they would be glad to do so under fair and reasonable conditions.

FUNDAMENTALS OF BANKING

Insured banks should be allowed to pay only 2¾ per cent on savings and time deposits. The banks holding such deposits should be required to pay one-fourth of 1 per cent upon time and savings deposits into the depositors' insurance fund. This plan would leave the total cost of time and savings accounts to depository banks the same as at present. One-fourth of 1 per cent of the ten billions of time and savings deposits in member banks June 30 last would equal $25,000,000. In 10 years, if that amount were collected upon insured time deposits, it would add two hundred and fifty millions more to the depositors' insurance fund.

Time deposits draw interest and add to the earnings of depositors and insurance will be mutually beneficial to both banks and depositors and would more than compensate for the small cost of contributions to the insurance fund by the insured.

A depositors' insurance fund can be established from these various sources which I have enumerated which will fully insure depositors in member banks against loss even under existing banking laws.

Many State bank insurance laws were faulty in that they did not empower the State to refuse bank charters where charters should not be granted. During the war boom the number of State banks nearly doubled. When deflation set in and bankruptcy became rampant and many banks that should not have been allowed to organize were forced to close the special assessments to take care of these failures became too big a burden for the solvent banks to bear. Competition for loans and deposits led to violations of vital banking laws and sound business rules. In Nebraska we had too many banks and not enough bankers. A sound banking system can only exist when the number of banks is limited to public needs. Banking is a quasi-public business. The public interest should always be the first consideration.

The people have two prime interests in banks. The first is to provide a safe place in which to put their money. The second is to establish a financial reservoir where money and credit may be obtained upon reasonable terms when needed.

Overbanking breeds bad banking, speculation, and bankruptcy. There must be a sufficient profit in any safe business to absorb the losses that occur. No bank fails that is prosperous and really making money. With these principles included, a depositors' insurance law will fully protect both public and private interests.

CONSTITUTIONALITY OF INSURANCE

The constitutionality of a bank deposit insurance law can not be disputed. In the case of Shallenberger against First State Bank of Nebraska and Noble State Bank against Haskell, reported in Two hundred and nineteenth United States Reports, 114, the United States Supreme Court sustained the State's right to require all corporations engaged in banking business to contribute a certain percentage to a fund for the protection of depositors who sustained losses because of the failure of insolvent banks. In the more recent case from Nebraska, Abie State Bank v. Weaver (282 U. S. 265), the United States Supreme Court again sustained the Nebraska statute.

Therefore the constitutionality of such a law is no longer open to dispute. The desirability of such protection can not be denied. In fact, the practice of requiring insurance of certain bank deposits is now in force. The United States Government will not deposit funds in a bank unless the Federal Government is insured against loss by the deposit of bonds or other accepted security should the bank fail. States and counties make like requirements. Neither a county, a State, or the Federal Government will trust their funds to a bank unless fully insured against loss.

But the citizen whose money makes possible the profits in the banking business is left to suffer his loss, no matter how severe the blow may be to him.

Prudent management and Government supervision has not proven sufficient security in the past. This fact gives warrant for additional legislation for the safety of the depositor who is entitled to every protection possible under the law. When a citizen deposits his money in a bank chartered and commissioned by his Government he should not suffer the loss of his money because of the bankruptcy of a corporation authorized, supervised, and controlled by the Government which created it.

The Federal reserve act was the product of the leadership and genius of Woodrow Wilson and demonstrated the ability of Congress to give to the Nation a currency system that has proven safe and sound under every condition. Its notes are not guaranteed by the Federal Government but are secured by the mobilized credit of the Nation and the united strength of the 12 great central banks. Ninety per cent of the Nation's commerce is not transacted with money but with bank checks and drafts drawn against the peoples' money deposited in the banks. A depositors' insurance law would give these instruments of commerce a standing second only to that of the Federal bank note itself and give to the people the same confidence in the safety of their bank deposits that they now have in the security of the bank note. They want assurance that when they put their money in a bank it is in a safe place.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I hope the gentleman will pass his bill in this session of Congress; and if he and the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] succeed in doing that, in my judgment they will have rendered the greatest service to the people of the Nation they have had rendered in a long time.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I thank the gentleman.

Last year the people drew more than two billions of money out of the banks and hid it away because they were afraid their money was not in a safe place. The fact that over 2,000 banks closed in 1931, with deposits of nearly $2,000,000,000, was the reason and warrant for that fear.

The President, by proclamation and organization of committees all over the country, is doing everything in his power to induce the people to put the money now in hiding back into the banks.

Congress is passing financial reconstruction laws and other banking bills to try to save the bankrupt or near bankrupt. Are we going to do nothing for the solvent citizen who can pay his debts and is the real support of every sound business institution we have left? I insist that if by proclamation or legislation the people are induced to put their hard-earned savings back into the banks, banks chartered and controlled by the Federal Government, they are entitled to every assurance possible under the Constitution that they shall always find they have put their money in a safe place.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Nebraska has expired.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. VINSON].

Mr. VINSON of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, on the 20th of January I announced to the House that in view of the very abnormal economic conditions which now confront us at home and abroad, and in the hope that some substantial results may be achieved at Geneva, the committee, in agreement with the chairman, voted, for the time being, not to report H. R. 8230.

Since that time conditions abroad have materially changed. The spokesman of the French delegation at Geneva has indicated that France demands a security pact in exchange for armament reduction. The American people have definitely repudiated this idea and are unwilling to commit this country to such a course of action. The British delegation has announced its desire for the reduction in the size of battleships and the abolition of the submarine. Our own delegation has indicated a desire to extend the Washington and London naval treaties beyond 1936, a general reduction, provided France and Italy can be brought into agreement, and the abolition of submarines. Japan has indicated her stand as favoring the reduction of the size of battleships and reduction in the size of their guns, reduction of the size of aircraft carriers and the allotted tonnage, the retention of submarines but with limited war uses. Italy has favored the abolition of battleships, of submarines, and of aircraft carriers.

These proposals differ widely, but nothing contained in them affects either cruisers or destroyers, except in so far as a total tonnage reduction is concerned. Some nations favor the total abolition of submarines, others insist upon their retention, and in view of these divergent views it is safe to assume that the abolition of the submarine is far off. Some nations favor a curtailment in the aircraft-carrier category and on cruisers with flying-on decks. No possible agreement can be foreseen which would in any way limit cruisers, destroyers, submarines, or aircraft carriers in such a way as to conflict with the provisions of the naval construction bill, H. R. 8230.

Some agreement may be reached with regard to the size of replacement battleships, but, as the London treaty provides that no such ships shall be laid down prior to 1936, no mention of them is made in the construction bill, and that bill will in no wise conflict with any agreement reached at Geneva.

In the Far East the situation has become more and more alarming.

No Member of this House more devoutly wishes for the preservation of peace than do I, but I believe that a definite pronouncement should be made to all the world of the intention of the United States to build up to the limits permitted under the London treaty. Such action on our part would, I believe, strengthen the hands of our delegates at Geneva and permit agreements which might not otherwise be possible. The efforts which we have made toward securing a reduction of naval armament have been outstanding. The Washington treaty provided for a limitation of the total tonnage that each country might have in battleships and in aircraft carriers and limited the size of guns that might be carried by battleships, aircraft carriers, and cruisers. The tonnages provided for in that treaty were in the ratio of 5 for Great Britain, 5 for the United States, and 3 for Japan, and the ratios so established are generally referred to as the 5–5–3 ratio of naval strength.

At the time of the Washington conference we had under construction a large number of battleships and battle cruisers, which upon completion would have made us the most powerful naval country in the world. But we had no such program for the cruiser types, and while other countries were willing to agree to tonnage limitations and treaty stipulations, which would cause us to scrap these new ships under construction, as well as many of those which we had already built, it was not possible to obtain an agreement that they should make corresponding sacrifices in the cruiser types and thus extend the 5–5–3 ratio. We had a destroyer superiority at the time and naturally were unwilling to sacrifice that unless other nations would sacrifice their superiority in cruisers.

The final result of the Washington conference was that the limitations as to total tonnage applied only to the battleship and aircraft-carrier types. No limitation was applied to the cruiser types other than a limit on the size of the gun which they might carry, and the nations were left free to build cruisers, destroyers, and submarines as they saw fit.

In order to obtain this agreement we not only had to destroy our ships that were building but many of the ships that we had already completed, and, in addition, we were forced to agree not to increase the fortifications at Guam or in the Philippine Islands.

It is particularly significant to note that the treaty was so deftly worded that Great Britain was permitted to construct and develop a great naval base at Singapore, while we were denied the right to construct defenses at either Guam or in the Philippines.

Our statesmen fondly hoped that the altruistic example that we had set to the rest of the world in destroying millions of dollars' worth of completed ships and other millions of dollars' worth of ships that were building would be followed by the other powers and that they would refrain from augmenting their naval strength in the types which were not limited by the treaty. That hope was shortly proved to be vain, for both Great Britain and Japan proceeded to lay down ship after ship of those types which were not limited by the treaty. From the date on which the treaty was signed, February, 1922, to the present time we have laid down, built, or appropriated for but 36 ships, as compared with 96 for Great Britain and 126 for Japan. During the same period France has laid down 152 and Italy 109 ships.

As a result of the Washington conference we destroyed 20 battleships that were completed, of a tonnage of 325,850 tons, which had cost us $117,753,000. In addition we scrapped 11 new battleships or battle cruisers, which were building and which, when completed, would have had a tonnage of 465,800, and which had cost us $94,757,000. In all 31 ships were destroyed, of a total tonnage of 795,650 tons, which had cost $212,510,000. Certainly that was an indication to the world of our desire for armament reduction. But as I previously pointed out, the example that we set of not building ships was not followed by other nations, who proceeded to build up their own navies.

A conference for the further limitation of naval armament met at Geneva in 1927. That conference failed to reach any agreement, chiefly because the demands of the other naval powers were so great that the United States could not subscribe to the high limitations which they desired to fix. With the failure of that conference and when it was seen that the other countries proposed to continue to build up their navies until they had an overwhelming strength in the cruiser type, Congress authorized the 15 cruiser program, in February of 1929. As soon as the powers saw that this country intended to provide cruisers for our Navy, Mr. McDonald hastened across the ocean and soon thereafter a naval conference was called to meet at London. That naval conference agreed to subdivide the cruiser category into two types of cruisers: Those which carry guns of more than 6.1-inch in caliber, and those which carry guns not exceeding 6.1-inch in caliber. The result of that conference was to restrict our country in the construction of the 15 cruisers which Congress had authorized in the year 1929. Only 7 of those could be completed under the terms of the London treaty prior to the year 1936, and but 3 others could be completed at all. One of those 3 could not be laid down prior to the year 1933, one not before the year 1934, and the third not before the year 1935. Total tonnage limitations were established for both categories of cruisers, for destroyers, and for submarines, as indicated in the table below, and agreement was made for the disposal of 3 of the 18 battleships we had been permitted to retain under the terms of the Washington treaty.

Categories	United States	British Commonwealth of Nations	Japan
Cruisers:
(a) With guns of more than 6.1-inch (155 mm.) caliber	Tons 180,000	Tons 146,800	Tons 108,400
(b) With guns of 6.1-inch (155 mm.) caliber or less	143,500	192,200	100,450
Destroyers	150,000	150,000	105,500
Submarines	52,700	52,700	52,700

Under the terms of the London treaty we disposed of or demilitarized three battleships, of a total of 75,300 tons, which has cost some $29,554,000. Before the expiration of that treaty in 1936 we must further dispose of 1 old 8-inch cruiser of 7,350 tons, which cost $4,312,000; of 128 destroyers of a total tonnage of 122,120 tons, which cost us $207,604,000; of 31 submarines of a tonnage of 17,540 tons, which cost us $26,460,000. In all, as a result of the London treaty, we must dispose of, before the end of the year 1936, 163 ships, of 222,310 tons, which cost $267,930,000.

As a result of the two limitation of armament treaties, the Washington treaty and the London treaty together have necessitated the destruction of 194 ships, totaling 1,013,960 tons, which cost $480,440,000. Certainly if ever a country set an example in limiting armament, the United States has done so. The example that has been set has not been followed by others. Japan, as I have previously indicated, since the signing of the Washington treaty has laid down 126 ships; Great Britain, 96; and the United States but 36.

The Navy of the United States is to-day confronted with a most serious situation. By the year 1934 every destroyer which we have afloat will become over age. We have 11 destroyers that have been appropriated for, but to date the President has seen fit to lay down but 5 of them. Great Britain by 1936, if she lays down not a single new destroyer, will have 47 under-age vessels of that type, and Japan will have 70 vessels of that type. In submarines we will have but 20 that are under age, as compared to 33 for Great Britain and 47 for Japan. In cruisers of the 6-inch category we will have but 10, as compared to 14 for Great Britain and 18 for Japan. In the 8-inch cruiser type we will have 16, as compared to 15 for Great Britain and 12 for Japan; and in the aircraft category we will have 3 carriers, as compared with 6 for Great Britain and 4 for Japan.

The 5–5–3 ratio, which was the basis of the Washington treaty, has become to-day a 5-6-4 ratio, and by the year 1936 will be almost a 5–5–5 ratio unless something is done by this country to maintain the ratios prescribed at Washington and at London. At Geneva the other day Japan was demanding equality for herself. In other words, she was demanding a 5–5–5 ratio. If in the year 1936 we enter another conference, Japan will actually have achieved a 5–5–5 ratio and will be actually stronger than the United States in almost every type except battleships and 8-inch cruisers.

In this connection, it must always be remembered that in order to reach an agreement at Washington we surrendered the right to fortify Guam and the Philippine Islands, and those islands lie at the doorstep of Japan. With a 5–5 ratio, as between the navies of the United States and Japan, we would have little chance of protecting them.

The question simmers down practically to this, Does the United States desire to maintain a navy?

It has been the consistent policy of our Government for over 125 years to maintain a Navy. That Navy has again and again proved its value to our country, a value far exceeding its cost; but the maintenance of a navy that is inadequate for the demands that may be made upon it is one of the worst forms of national extravagance. Real economy is achieved only if an adequate navy is maintained.

The Members of this House have been repeatedly told that 70 per cent of the Federal appropriations go for preparedness and wars, past and future. The annual appropriations for the Navy are about 9 per cent of the Federal appropriations, those for the Army are about 11 per cent, so that a total of about 20 per cent is the actual part of the Federal appropriations that goes for the maintenance of the Army and Navy, or goes for preparedness. The remaining 50 per cent of the sum, which you have been told is for wars, past and future, goes for the reduction of and interest on the public debt, for pensions, for the hospitalization of veterans, and for the relief of those who answered the call of their country in its hour of need. That 50 per cent is in reality the cost that we are to-day paying for our lack of preparedness.

Our Navy is maintained to support the national policies and commerce and to guard the continental and overseas possessions of the United States. There is no word of offense in that policy; there is no thought of offense in that policy. It is all defense—defense of our territory against invasion, defense of our commerce, defense of our national policies, which carries with it defense of our rights and the rights of our citizens.

Great and populous as is our country, we must realize that size and population are in themselves no protection. China, with an area greater than our country and with a population three times as numerous, has been unable to keep Japan from extending her control over Manchuria and over Shanghai; but, unlike China, we have, in addition to our great continental territory, island possessions which lie thousands of miles from the North American Continent, and the Panama Canal, connecting the Atlantic and the Pacific. The foreign commerce of our country is valued at about $8,000,000,000, and the sea-borne coastwise trade at about $6,000,000,000. Much of out intercoastal trade flows through the Panama Canal, but all of it, coastwise and foreign, is of vital importance to our country. President Hoover himself, in October, 1928, said:

> We might survive as a Nation, though on a lower living standard and wages, if we have to suppress the 9 or 10 per cent of our total production now sold abroad. But our whole standard of life would be paralyzed and much of the joy of living destroyed if we were denied sufficient imports. If this happens, we must stagnate and degenerate in civilization. We could not run an automobile, we could not operate a dynamo, or use a telephone were we without imported raw materials from the tropics. To-day we are the largest importers and the second largest exporters of goods in the world. Our total volume of exports translates itself into employment for 2,400,000 families; and, in addition to this, millions more families find employment in the manufacture of imported raw materials.

An interruption of our sea-borne trade would bring about, in a comparatively short time, an economic situation many times worse than that which now confronts us. We could not export our cotton, wheat, meat products, or manufactured articles of any description, and hence the price of these articles would be greatly depressed, and we would be without storage facilities for those which we could not consume ourselves. Millions of people would be thrown out of work and our planters and farmers would face economic ruin. We would be deprived of such essential raw materials as manganese, tin, shellac, mica, and rubber, without which we could not make steel or manufacture automobiles or machinery, either steam or electric.

We would lack coffee, tea, quinine, and other articles which are so generally and widely used as to be necessary for the comfort and welfare of our people. No nation has a greater interest in keeping the seas free for trade than has the United States.

Some have held that there is a moral obligation upon us to build up to the limits prescribed in the London and Washington treaties so as not to disturb the ratios provided for in those treaties. Whether or not this be so, the material interests of our country require that we should do so. Without such a navy we can not protect our sea borne trade, the Panama Canal, or even assure our country against invasion. This country has ever been prone to protect its national rights and to preserve the rights and properties of those citizens, and for this purpose a navy is absolutely indispensable.

I believe that the welfare and safety of the United States require that our Navy should be built up to the limits and ratios permitted under the London and Washington treaties. Whether we like it or not, the United States is to-day the leader of the world, the leader of civilization, and the nation that is looked to by the rest of the world.

This country does not require a navy of one strength when conditions are prosperous and of another strength when there is an economic depression, for we have the same country, the same people, and the same interests to protect at all times, and we all know that depressions are temporary.

It is in times of depression, however, that more can be purchased for a dollar than at any other time. To-day more and better warships can be purchased for a given sum than at any recent period. The construction of vessels which have been provided for in the naval construction bill would afford employment to many men who otherwise must soon be forced into the ranks of the unemployed, and will furnish work that will prevent some of our great shipbuilding plants from being forced to close their doors and to discharge their employees. Eighty-five per cent of the money spent on the construction of ships flows directly back into the pockets of labor—40 per cent goes directly to labor in the shipyard and something over 45 per cent goes to labor used in preparing the material before it reaches the shipyard. I would not stand here upon this floor and advocate that we build ships which are not needed by our Navy merely to relieve unemployment, but when those ships are needed, when the welfare and interests of our country require their construction, when we can purchase them at a minimum of cost, and when their construction will provide labor for thousands of American citizens who would otherwise be forced into the ranks of the unemployed, I believe that this is the proper time to provide such work for our people.

The bill provides for a definite naval program, laid down in an orderly, conservative fashion, in such manner that excessive expenditures need not be made in any one year. This orderly and systematic construction should materially reduce the cost of construction of the individual vessels. Where two similar ships are built, one following immediately after the other, a very great saving may be expected. In the case of our new airship Akron the cost of the initial ship was about $5,000,000, but the cost of the second ship, Macon, will be only about $3,000,000. By providing that the second ship should be laid down immediately following the completion of the first, a saving of about $2,000,000 was effected, or a saving of 20 per cent of what the ships would otherwise have cost had they been contracted for separately. The 5-year naval aircraft program approved by Congress in 1926 was estimated to cost $85,078,750. When finished last June the actual cost was $58,771,000. This great saving of nearly $27,000,000 represented 31 per cent of the estimated cost, and was due primarily to the fact that there was an orderly, steady, progressive, continuing program. A spasmodic, irregular program for the construction of the vessels provided for in this bill would very probably result in increasing the cost of those ships, while a steady, orderly, continuing program will very probably result in saving 15 to 20 per cent.

The construction provided for in the naval construction bill in no way conflicts with the so-called 1-year naval holiday. The Secretary of State was requested to furnish the Naval Committee with definite information as to whether any tentative agreement which had been entered into by the State Department or by the President would in any way act to prevent the immediate construction of naval vessels, and whether or not the President was in any way restricted from proceeding with the construction of destroyers which the Congress had appropriated for and which had not as yet been laid down. The Secretary of State, in reply, quoted a letter addressed to the Secretary of the Navy, under date of October 28, 1931, in which he stated his opinion of the effect of the year's armament truce in the following language:

> It permits the completion of ships building or contracted for; it permits replacement building, and it would seem by omission of any provision to the contrary that it permits authorization and appropriation for other vessels provided they are not begun before November 1, 1932.

Not only does the construction provided for in this bill not conflict with the provisions of the so-called 1-year naval holiday, but it in nowise conflicts with the provisions of the Washington treaty of 1922 or the London treaty of 1930. Moreover, the provisions contained therein are such as will in nowise conflict with any agreements that can be reached at Geneva.

We have listened to the siren song of delay for 10 years, while our naval strength has sunk relatively lower and lower. The pacifists, those who believe that complete and total disarmament is the way to eternal peace, would have us continue this delay, but to continue delay means the slow but ultimate destruction of the American Navy. Delay has already reduced us to the point where, unless we lay down new ships, we shall find that by the year 1936 we will have but 11 destroyers that are under age, as compared with 47 for Great Britain and 70 for Japan. We shall have but 20 under-age submarines, as compared with 33 for Great Britain and 47 for Japan. We shall have but 10 of the 6-inch cruisers, as compared to 14 for Great Britain and 18 for Japan. It is high time that the world appreciated that the people of the United States intend to provide and maintain a Navy adequate for the protection of our country, our commerce, and our citizens. This naval construction bill is the first step in that direction. It does not in itself appropriate a single dollar from the Treasury of the United States. It is merely an authorization which is necessary in order that the Congress may make appropriations when in its judgment this would be desirable.

Not only do I feel that this bill should be immediately enacted, but I feel that appropriations for the ships that are provided for in it should be immediately forthcoming. Did the people of this country fully appreciate the naval situation, did they realize how rapidly their Navy is sinking to the position of that of a second-class naval power, I am sure that there would be a most insistent demand for the immediate enactment of this bill and for the construction of the ships provided for under it, and this in spite of the present economic situation.

I believe that the safety and welfare of this country insistently demand the enactment of this naval construction bill at this time.

I believe that no people in the world have a more generous and noble character than the people of the United States.

So long as we remain strong our actions in world affairs will be directed by our own people. If we become weak, our actions will be controlled by a less generous and less noble people.

No Government which fails to provide for its own preservation against the assaults of every probable foe is entitled to the support of its people. The primary duty of government is self-preservation, and no logic can justify it in stripping itself of its means of defense and relying for its preservation upon the mercy, the pity, or the love of other nations. [Applause.]

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER].

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, the bill before the committee does not follow out the announced policy of the leaders of the House to reduce expenditures on behalf of the taxpayers. They have declined to reduce in any amount the expenditures heretofore had for the enforcement of the prohibition laws. That is the only branch of the Government where the Committee on Appropriations, so far as I have been able to learn, has not endeavored to reduce expenditures. They have reduced expenditures in connection with other Federal statutes. They have reduced expenditures for running down and capturing counterfeiters, and those who violate the white slave act, and the automobile theft act, and every other penal statute.

A few days ago in the Committee on the Judiciary a vote was had upon reporting out a resolution providing for submitting to the people through conventions the question of whether or not they desired to retain the prohibition law as it is or to amend it. The chairman of the committee, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS], gave out a statement in which he gave the names of those who voted in favor of submitting the resolution to the people and those who were against it. He included his own name among those who voted against giving the House an opportunity to vote on this resolution, and a statement which said, in effect, that this was no time, in his judgment, for the Congress to discuss or to consider prohibition, since we had before us many matters touching the economic recovery of the country. It is my opinion, though, that prohibition is a very vital matter connected with the economic welfare and success of the country and that it has a place in the whole scheme of the rehabilitation of the country and the giving of employment to the people. I was one of those whose name was given out as having voted to give the House an opportunity to vote on the question of whether or not the States might, through conventions called by the people in the various States for that purpose only, consider whether they might, if they desire, do away with prohibition or change it as best suited and desired by the citizens of certain States, but not to interfere with those States that did not desire to make any change in prohibition.

Since all the professional prohibition organizations profess to believe that the overwhelming majority of the American people believe in prohibition, I can not understand why anyone should vigorously object to granting them permission to vote directly on this issue. An overwhelming vote in support of prohibition would prove that the sentiment of the American people was in favor of it and would do more than any other thing to silence the opposition to it.

One of the corner stones of our Republic is that all governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. As we know, the American people by referendum vote have never given their consent to the national prohibition law. It is my judgment, after 12 years of observation, as a citizen and as a Member of Congress, that this problem will never be solved until the people have had an opportunity to vote on it directly.

I can not conceive that any person would wish to deprive the American people of the sacred right to determine for themselves whether they wish prohibition or not. They ought to have the right to express their opinion through the ballot box. Voting for delegates to a convention that is to pass upon national prohibition is the best and most direct way this can be done. To deny the people the right to vote thus upon prohibition is to deny them the right to exercise the most sacred principle of our Government.

State legislatures sometimes fail to register the will of the people in the matter of legislation. In November, 1918, the question of the adoption of a prohibition amendment to the Missouri constitution was submitted to the people of that State. With thousands of young men deprived of suffrage by their military service, the people of Missouri rejected the principle of prohibition by a majority of almost 75,000. When the members of the legislature, elected on the day this referendum was taken, met in January they wholly ignored the sentiment of the people as expressed at the polls and ratified the eighteenth amendment.

There is much evidence to support the popular impression that the people of the United States were the victims of a high-powered propaganda campaign conducted by a highly organized minority, which finally resulted in the adoption of the eighteenth amendment. The records of the several States show that in advance of the ratification of the eighteenth amendment the people of 23 States had adopted prohibition by direct vote. In these 23 States only 2,666,408 votes were cast for prohibition and 2,104,906 against it. The population of these States was 33,077,701 in the 1920 census.

The people of 25 States, having a population of 72,272,348, had never adopted prohibition by popular vote. It is therefore apparent that only 2½ per cent of the people of the United States had voted for prohibition prior to its adoption as a national policy.

The records of the Anti-Saloon League, the principal prohibition organization, show that only 20,000 out of more than 150,000 churches in the United States cooperated in the movement to fasten prohibition upon the people. One of the most widely known women prohibition agitators had publicly stated that in the campaign to force prohibition upon 120,000,000 people less than 500,000 people were actively interested. As shown by the records of the Anti-Saloon League, not more than 300,000 people contributed the campaign funds of more than $50,000,000 that was used to finance the propaganda organizations which lobbied prohibition through Congress and the State legislatures.

These facts present compelling reasons why the people should be given an opportunity, even now, to express their will on prohibition in referendum elections. Surely, if we believe in the principles upon which our country was founded, we would not wish by some arbitrary constitutional provision to bind the people forever in the chains of a policy to which they have never assented.

The policy of the country as expressed in the seventeenth and nineteenth amendments is to give the people greater voice in the affairs of the Government. The seventeenth amendment took away from the State legislatures the power to elect United States Senators and vested that power in the people. The nineteenth amendment enfranchised the women and gave them direct voice in government.

If, as it has been so frequently stated by some, the nineteenth amendment came to the rescue of the eighteenth amendment, everyone should welcome an opportunity to demonstrate that fact and permanently settle the prohibition question.

The policy of protesting against a referendum on the prohibition issue seems to indicate a fear to submit the cause to the test of a popular vote. Either that or those opposed to that are not in sympathy with the traditions and policy of our Government.

If any law ever written into the Federal and State Constitutions has had a fair trial, it is the eighteenth amendment and its supporting legislation.

The combined power of the Federal Government and most of the State governments has been invoked to enforce this legislation. This is true of no other Federal amendment or law.

The Federal Government alone, in direct and indirect appropriations, has expended more than $600,000,000 in an attempt to enforce the law. The State governments have spent enormous sums in the same effort. The Federal Government has put the stigma of criminality upon nearly 1,000,000 persons and the State governments upon a million more. The jails, penitentiaries, and prison camps have been filled with the victims of the law. The courts have construed every moot question against the citizens and in favor of the Government in order to make more effective its enforcement.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that there is not a quorum present.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I do not yield for a speech.

Mr. BLANTON. If the gentleman does not want a quorum present, I will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. DYER. I do not yield to the gentleman and, of course, his remarks will not appear.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, a point of order is always in order.

Mr. DYER. I do not object to the point of order, but I object to the gentleman's speech. I will yield to the gentleman in a few minutes if the gentleman cares to ask a question.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield for a question now?

Mr. DYER. Not now.

I was speaking, when I was interrupted, about the expense of prohibition.

Congress has voted every dollar recommended for the enforcement of the act. It has adopted numerous amendments to make its enforcement more effective. It has appropriated millions of dollars to build penitentiaries to house its victims, and it has enlarged the Federal judiciary and the Federal prosecuting machinery in order that the violators of the law might be more speedily and surely punished. We have created the greatest spy system in the world to harass our people.

If the prohibition law has not had a fair trial, wherein lies the fault? Surely the Congress of the United States, of which I am a Member, has done its duty.

In the quest to determine why the law has failed, may I ask you to examine with me some of the records?

Perhaps you have the biography of Wayne B. Wheeler, the great lobbyist of the Anti-Saloon League, written by his publicity secretary, Justin Steuart. The opening paragraph reads:

> Wayne B. Wheeler controlled six Congresses, dictated to two Presidents of the United States, directed legislation in most of the States of the Union, picked the candidates of the important elective State and Federal offices, held the balance of power in both the Republican and Democratic Parties, distributed more patronage than any dozen other men, supervised a Federal bureau from outside without official authority, and was recognized by friend and foe alike as the most masterful and powerful single individual in the United States.

It is generally believed that Mr. Wheeler, before his death, wrote this description of his extraordinary unofficial usurpation of power over the Government of the people of the United States. It does not appear to be an exaggeration.

The reports which Mr. Wheeler made to the executive committee of the Anti-Saloon League show that, without authority of law, he ran the Prohibition Enforcement Bureau of the United States. He appointed its officers and controlled its patronage. He dictated the appointment of numerous Federal judges, district attorneys, and other officials charged with the enforcement of the law. He was powerful enough to retain a prohibition commissioner in office when a President, on four different occasions, sought to remove him.

The records of the Anti-Saloon League prove beyond dispute that it controlled every function of government charged with the duty of enforcing the prohibition law.

If the prohibition law has not had a fair trial, the blame must be laid upon the shoulders of the professional prohibition organizations which unlawfully and unconstitutionally usurped the legal powers of government and used those powers in an attempt to enforce the law. If, under those circumstances, the law can not be enforced, I do not see how it will ever be possible to enforce it.

Do you think the people of the United States will ever again submit to the unconstitutional usurpation of official authority by propaganda organizations and permit their representatives in Congress to appropriate another $600,000,000 to experiment with the law? Do you think the people will continue to elect Presidents who will permit the Anti-Saloon League to boss them, or Congresses that will bow to the dictation of this professional reform organization? How long do you think the people will continue to suppress their revolutionary impulses while the Anti-Saloon League sets itself up to serve as judge, prosecutor, and jury to tyrannize them and deprive them of their liberties and their property?

The rising tide of indignation against the eighteenth amendment and the tyrannical enforcement act presages a progressive and accumulative resistance to these laws. The people will not much longer submit to being tyrannized by a little handful of professional propagandists whose principal interest in the law is the money they cajole out of the public to sustain them in their easy jobs. Certainly the sentiment at the present time is much more aggressive against the prohibition law than it was in the early part of the 12-year period. It is not likely again to have such a favorable opportunity of enforcement as in the past.

In this senseless and fruitless effort to enforce an unenforceable law the professional dry organizations have cost the people of the United States not only the $600,000,000 appropriated for prohibition but have caused them a loss of more than $6,000,000,000 in Federal revenues. A large part of the revenues lost to the State and Federal Governments has been diverted into the hands of gangsters to finance crime virulent in character and unparalleled in magnitude.

The cost of crime arising out of or associated with prohibition has been estimated from $10,000,000,000 to $15,000,000,000 a year. The damage to our country, as evidenced by disrespect for law and constituted authority, is unmeasurable and irreparable.

In the face of this humiliating record I do not believe that I should use the authority delegated to me by my constituents to deprive the people of the right to vote on whether they wish to continue this destructive, hypocritical, crime-breeding, corrupting, and demoralizing policy or get rid of it. It seems to me that it would be the highest expression of my duty as a citizen and as a Member of Congress to afford the peaople of the United States an opportunity to voice their opinion of prohibition through the secret ballot.

No government is a free government which denies its citizens the right to express themselves freely at the ballot box on any great issue. No government is a just government unless it derives its powers from the consent of the governed as expressed by direct vote. No law can long remain upon the statute books unless it represents the sober, deliberate, and intellectual judgment of the people. Laws enacted during periods of great emotional upheaval, or as the result of high-powered propaganda, ought always, after a cooling-off period, be submitted to the electorate for a test of their sentiment toward them.

More than three-quarters of a century ago the immortal Lincoln voiced a great truth when he said that "no law is stronger than is the sentiment in the community where it is to be enforced." That truth was vigorously and emphatically repeated by the report of the President's Commission on Law Observance and Enforcement.

That body of impartial and eminent investigators, after studying every phase of prohibition for more than 18 months, reported to the President and the Congress that public sentiment did not sustain the prohibition law and that there was no prospect that public sentiment ever would support the law.

Why should we wish to impose this law upon the American people when every sign of the times indicates that the people wish to throw off this yoke of prohibition oppression? Are the professional prohibition organizations greater and wiser than the people?

It was suggested by a distinguished Member of the Senate a few days ago that if Bishop Cannon, master mind of the Anti-Saloon League, and some of his associate professional prohibition propagandists could be shipped to the North Pole, Congress would, within 24 hours, grant the people of the United States relief from the oppressive and expensive burdens of prohibition. Perhaps Congress might solve the problem by putting them on a life pension, and thus save the people several billions of dollars a year.

The propaganda with which Members of Congress are being flooded, protesting against a vote of the people on prohibition, seems to be ample proof that the dry leaders feel that the people would reject prohibition and that the only way it can be retained is by denying the people the right to vote upon it. I can not believe that at this day it would be a wise thing to discard the principle enunciated in the Declaration of Independence that "governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed."

In the Wickersham committee's report on the prohibition laws, House Document 722, on page 4, the committee says:

From 1862 until the World War every brewery and distillery in the United States was operated under a Federal license, subject to policing by the Federal Government and required to maintain and file elaborate records. Subject to these provisions the liquor traffic was conducted with the sanction of the Federal Government, which profited from the business to the extent of depending upon it for over one-fourth of the national revenue over a long series of years.

In the same document Judge Anderson, on page 90, says:

The people are being poisoned with bad and unregulated liquor to the permanent detriment of the public health and the ultimate increase of dependency and crime. The illicit producer, the bootlegger, and the speak-easy are reaping a rich harvest of profits and are becoming daily more securely intrenched. The enormous revenues (estimated at from two to three billion dollars per annum) placed in the hands of the lawless and criminal elements of society through this illegal traffic are not only enabling them to carry on this business in defiance of the Government but to organize and develop other lines of criminal activities to an extent which threatens social and economic security. The country is growing restive under these conditions. The situation demands some definite and constructive relief.

The loss to agriculture by reason of prohibition is enormous.

In the hearing on the food control bill before the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry in June, 1918, Gov. Carl E. Milliken, of Maine, read the resolutions on prohibition adopted by the Federal Council of Churches. The following is an extract:

The Federal Council of Churches, officially representing 30 denominations with a communicant membership of more than 80,000,000, in special session assembled, desires to record its conviction that the immediate prohibition of the liquor traffic as a war measure is essential to the conservation of the economic resources and latent powers of the Nation.

Five eminent economists estimate on the basis of the latest positive official figures that 7,000,000,000 pounds of food materials are used in the production of fermented and distilled liquors. Two university professors of physics estimate, after eliminating the amount necessary for denatured alcohol, the food value of the remainder would supply the energy requirements of 7,000,000 men for a year. The Brewers Year Book declares that the toil of 75,000 farmers for six months is required to furnish these foodstuffs.

The following statement was made by Miss Anna Adams Gordon, then president of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union:

In our first command, to conserve food, Mr. Hoover, in a letter to Senator SHEPPARD, dated June 4, 1918, which is found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, page 8034, said:

"The cessation of brewing would affect a saving of approximately 3,150,000 bushels a month from a nutritive point of view. It needs no comment from me, from a food point of view, that I should favor the saving of this amount of grain."

To conserve fuel is the next command, and the Fuel Administrator announces a possible shortage of 75,000,000 tons of coal. We understand the breweries use about 5,000,000 tons annually.

To conserve labor is another command. Three hundred thousand men engaged in the manufacture, sale, and distribution of alcoholic liquor should be released for "win the war work."

Wayne B. Wheeler, then general counsel for the Anti-Saloon League, in the course of a statement on the legal points involved in the proposed legislation said:

This legislation has not only a reasonable relation but a direct bearing on these subjects clearly within the power of Congress—1,000,000 men will be taken from the ranks of the producers, and the food supply short and help lacking, to plant crops. Liquor wastes enough food to maintain 7,000,000 men.

Herbert Hoover, then Food Administrator:

Entirely aside from the ethical questions, my impression is that we could conserve from 50,000,000 to 60,000,000 bushels of grain from the brewing side.

[NOTE.—At the time this statement was made the amount of grain rationed to the brewing industry had been greatly reduced. In the letter referred to by Miss Gordon, Mr. Hoover made his celebrated statement that "it is mighty difficult to get drunk on 2¾ per cent beer, but easy enough if we force a substitution of whisky."]

Dr. E. A. Taylor, professor of physiological chemistry of the University of Pennsylvania:

By these operations of prohibition of manufacture there would be a cessation of the manufacture of beer and complete withdrawal of all beer from the market in a short time. * * * This would save 80,000,000 bushels of grain, 60,000,000 of which is barley.

Dr. Wilbur Crafts, superintendent and treasurer of the International Reform Bureau, said:

I think it is about 110,000,000 bushels, very conservatively speaking, that is wasted in drink—6,000,000,000 pounds is the statement of the Council of National Defense.

Clinton N. Howard, of Rochester, N. Y., lecturer for the International Reform Bureau, said:

What would be the effect on the food conservation of the Nation if the 110,000,000 bushels of grain made into 2,000,000,000 gallons of beer and 140,000,000 gallons of whisky consumed in this country last year had been ground into flour and baked into bread? It would give a loaf of bread every day in the year to 15,000,000 families.

25,000 FARMERS TO GROW 25,000,000 BUSHELS OF GRAIN

In connection with the exchange of 25,000,000 bushels of Federal Farm Board wheat for Brazilian coffee, Mr. George S. Milnor, the $50,000 a year grain expert of the Federal Farm Board and the Farmers' National Grain Corporation, testified before the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry on November 26, 1931; he stated that it would give full-time employment to 25,000 farmers to grow the 25,000,000 bushels of wheat exchanged for Brazilian coffee. That makes it very clear that it would take the full time of 80,000 farmers to produce the 80,000,000 bushels of grain that would be used by the breweries on the preprohibition basis. In 12 prohibition years the farmers, on account of the prohibition of beer, have lost a market for 960,000,000 bushels of grain and 960,000 farmers have lost a year's work and income.

The following appears in a statement submitted to the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, June 19, 1918, by War Time Prohibition Association, as having been written by Prof. Irving Fisher, of Yale University.

Senator TYDINGS, of Maryland, in a communication to the Baltimore Sun of August 25, 1931, quotes the same statement, saying that it was written by Professor Fisher, and inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD by Senator Cummins, of Iowa.

The statement follows:

Transportation required by the breweries

	Tons
Raw material, 3,000,000 pounds of foodstuffs	1,500,000
Required coal	3,000,000
Product 60,000,000 barrels	9,000,000
Total on teams and cars	13,500,000

All of which require hauling and over half of which require railroad transportation.

This requires over 200,000 freight cars during the year and uses several hundred locomotives constantly and increases freight congestion.

SUGAR

The breweries use 64,000,000 pounds of sugar, and you are short of sugar.

LABOR SHORTAGE

The breweries of the United States employ 65,000 men, but the total engaged in making, handling, and selling it is over 300,000.

The amount of freight which Professor Fisher says was originated by the breweries would be sufficient to load 675,000 cars with 20 tons of freight. I understand that the average freight-car load in the United States is 18 tons, but I have preferred to be liberal and used 20 tons instead.

On April 23, 1917, Hon. David F. Houston submitted to the Senate Committee on Agriculture a statement of the value of the farm products used in the brewing industry from 1903 to 1916.

The values from 1910 to 1916 follow:

1911	97,700,000
1912	127,600,000
1913	92,700,000
1914	103,600,000
1915	105,700,000
1916	101,000,000

[From a statement to the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, June 19, 1918, by Miss Anna Adams Gordon, president of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union]

To conserve fuel is the next command, and the Fuel Administration announces a possible shortage of 75,000,000 tons of coal. We understand the breweries use about 5,000,000 tons yearly.

[From a statement to the same committee on the same day by Deets Pickett, research secretary of the Methods Board of Temperance, Prohibition, and Public Morals]

I want to submit to the committee some testimony which leads us to believe the coal problem could be solved by prohibition. In the United States Census Reports for 1910, volume 8, page 363, the consumption of coal by the brewing industry for the year ending June 30, 1909, was 2,990,357 tons, or three and one-half times as much as the bakers, six times as much as the printers and publishers, nine times as much as the manufacturers of boots and shoes, and twenty-five times as much as the manufacturers of men's clothing.

Mr. Pickett also submitted a statement from L. P. Ross, general manager of the Northern Iron Ore Co., to W. S. Blauvelt, of the United States Fuel Administration at Washington, in which he said:

We estimate that the breweries and saloons consume coal at the rate of approximately 273,328 three-ton carloads per annum. This amount of fuel would produce approximately 8,197,140 tons of pig iron.

We estimate that approximately 700,000 railroad cars are required to transport raw material for the breweries, and the beer produced in the United States per annum, based on all the beer being shipped, but not including the return shipment of empty barrels.

We are reliably informed that approximately 350,000 men are engaged in the liquor traffic.

The only objection to permitting the people to have such a beer, nonintoxicating, is that it will restore saloons. I, too, am opposed to any encouragement of saloons; and if the prohibition law is modified as I propose, this beer will not be distributed through saloons. In fact it will materially aid in getting rid of a lot of saloons, otherwise known as speak-easies, that now exist. These speak-easies sell beer now, which consists of home-brew, alley made or illegally imported from Canada or some other country. When the people can get good brewery-made beer through their grocers or other distributing agencies, they will not patronize speak-easies that sell this mostly unfit beer, highly alcoholic, as well as other intoxicating and poisonous liquors.

Careful investigations indicate that there are now in the United States 220,000 speak-easies, distributed as follows:

Arizona	750
California	15,000
Colorado	1,500
Connecticut	5,000
Delaware	250
District of Columbia	500
Idaho	500
Illinois	40,000
Indiana	2,500
Iowa	3,500
Kansas	1,000
Louisiana	5,000
Maine	1,000
Maryland	5,000
Massachusetts	10,000
Michigan	10,000
Minnesota	2,000
Missouri	3,000
Montana	5,000
Nebraska	1,500
New Hampshire	1,000
New Jersey	10,000
New Mexico	750
New York	42,000
Nevada	500
Two Dakotas	1,000
Ohio	5,000
Oklahoma	2,000
Oregon	3,000
Pennsylvania	20,000
Rhode Island	2,000
Texas	3,500
Utah	750
Vermont	750
Virginia	1,000
Washington	4,000
West Virginia	1,500
Wisconsin	7,500
Wyoming	500
Alabama, Florida, Georgia, Mississippi, North Carolina, South Carolina, Tennessee, Arkansas, and Kentucky	2,500
Total	222,500

In some of the other States, particularly in the South, corn liquor is the popular beverage and is distributed openly by bootleggers, the number of which is estimated at 50,000.

There has also been gathered data to show that illegitimate beer—that of more than one-half of 1 per cent of alcoholic content—is being consumed in the United States to the extent of approximately 4,000,000,000 gallons annually. This is all manufactured illegally and the most of it outside of this country. As a result our farmers do not benefit in the sale of grain and other agricultural products that are used nor do our citizens secure employment in the making of it, and our Government, now sorely pressed for revenue, gets nothing in taxes.

Will the American people long tolerate this condition?

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to call my friend's attention to the fact, because the gentleman is the ranking Republican on the Committee on the Judiciary, that in the last election, in 1928, when there was a sharply drawn issue of wet and dry, with Governor Smith posing as the exemplar of the wets and President Hoover as the exemplar of the drys, President Hoover received 6,000,000 more votes as a dry than did the popular wet. How does the gentleman explain that when he speaks of the people expressing their sentiments on this issue?

Mr. DYER. I will say to the gentleman that the votes for Mr. Hoover and Mr. Smith were not altogether upon the wet-and-dry issue. They were for Mr. Hoover largely because the people of the country felt that he could best control and manage the affairs of this Government in the interest of all the people.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, they had all become disgusted with the Harding-Coolidge-Hoover administrations long before the election, and they accepted a supposed dry, preferring the lesser evil.

Mr. DYER. I will say to the gentleman that Mr. Hoover, of course, is able to take care of himself. He will be the candidate of the Republican Party again in the coming election; and notwithstanding the campaign of slander and tyrannical efforts of the Democratic National Committee to injure and to undermine him with the people, he will again triumph and be elected, because the people of the country want him. A wet-and-dry issue will not defeat him. This Congress controlled by the Democrats is dry and it will do nothing against prohibition, but just the contrary.

Mr. BLANTON. Even my partisan friend from Missouri does not expect him to carry a single pivotal State.

Mr. DYER. Oh, yes, I do; and I predict his reelection. If it was not for the wet Democrats the Democratic Party would not now be in control of the House. The vacancies caused by the death of Republican dry Members have been filled by wet Democrats from Michigan, New Jersey, New Hampshire, and other places, including the fourteenth Texas district.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, but it was the economic issues that controlled and not the wet-and-dry issue.

Mr. DYER. Oh, they made their fight purely upon the wet-and-dry issue in all of those places where they elected men to fill vacancies, and the result of it is that the House has been organized by Democrats. I am very glad of it.

We have a very able and distinguished Speaker, and the Democrats being in power places them in a position where they must cooperate with our great President and do their part to relieve conditions that now face us from an economic and unemployment standpoint. The Democratic leaders in the House will do this, too, if outside Democratic influences will keep their hands off and let us, Democrats and Republicans, work unitedly for the welfare of our great country. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. But these candidates had the background of a party that has always stood for the people as against a party that has always stood for special interests.

Mr. DYER. The Democrats did not have any party in New Hampshire and New Jersey.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman will find out in the coming election this next November that they have a party in those States.

Mr. DYER. It was purely a wet-and-dry issue and nothing else. The gentleman's party is in the majority in this House because wet Democrats were elected in these off elections. [Applause.] Yet it is not possible to do anything against prohibition with the organization of this House as it is; with the Speaker a dry; with the chairman of the great Judiciary Committee, elegant, able, and fine gentleman that he is, a dry; with the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, bringing in $11,000,000 for prohibition, without crossing off a dollar, a dry. The House is dry. It is controlled by the dry Democrats of the South, and you fellows from the North and the East might as well go home and tell your people about it, that you can not do anything about it.

Mr. BLANTON. In New Hampshire and New Jersey the controlling issues were economic ones and not the wet-and-dry issue. We won on economic issues.

Mr. DYER. They tell me they only talked about liquor in all those districts in order to get elected. [Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to use to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. KARCH].

Mr. KARCH. Mr. Chairman, in due course this House will be asked to consider measures originating in the Senate calculated to provide for a more efficient supervision of foreign loan transactions. There may be similar bills pending in the House. So far none have come to my notice.

It may not become my lot at the time these measures are being considered in this House to be accorded any of the available time for debate, and I therefore seize this opportunity to express my views on legislation of that character and to go on record as favoring the enactment of these measures to which I have just referred, and to be unalterably opposed to the cancellation, in whole or in part, of what are popularly known as "war debts."

Mr. Chairman, as the parade of international bankers, who have sent into the reaches of the world that flood of gold, has crossed the witness stand before the Finance Committee of the Senate, and as those international bankers have blandly hidden behind the sheerest technicalities in denying the essential information as to how and why they were willing to betray their own people for the Judas price of profits, the countries of Europe, of Central and South America, prepare calmly and grimly to tell us that they will not pay; that they will not repay the flood of gold we so generously sent to aid them in their hour of prostration after the great madness had ended.

They have already told us they would not repay the flood of gold we sent them while the great madness was raging, nor yet the further golden torrent we poured out to them for their political and industrial development.

Every Member of this House knows that we canceled practically the whole of the debt due us from the Allies for money we loaned them during the period of actual hostilities, and also some of the money we loaned them after the armistice.

My time will not permit me to go into the details of the interallied debt-funding agreements under the act of 1926, but it is a well-known and accepted fact that the debts now due our Government from 20 foreign nations, amounting to more than eleven and a half billions, do not represent by any means the sum of the gold we poured into Europe during the war and after the hostilities had ceased.

Those figures do not represent at all the billions in supplies of every character—from railroad locomotives to clothing and from trucks and tractors to medicines—which we sold at the merest fraction of their value to our Allies in whose countries they then were. The sum now due us, of course, does not include the millions piled upon millions of our money given as doles to foreign peoples to feed and clothe them by that greatest of all givers of other people's money—Herbert Hoover.

All these years our people have patiently and painfully borne that burden of debt.

In our own hour of need what do we hear from those countries which called so plaintively to us in their suffering? Why, sir, this is what we hear—and I quote from the Washington Star of the 21st of this month:

> The time for making a clean slate of all reparations and war debts is rapidly approaching its final phase.
> Views as to how to approach this question to the best advantage of everybody—

That is, everybody but the people of the United States—> are being exchanged between the principal European nations. Meanwhile the Department of State, while pleading ignorance of what is going on across the ocean—

Just as it pleaded ignorance of any knowledge of or participation in loans to South American countries until the Peruvian loan with its corruption, the Barco oil concession involved in the Colombian loan, the Cuban loan involving the son-in-law of President Machado, and the Panama loan involving charges of deleted and altered reports were revealed before the Senate Finance Committee recently—and now I continue to quote—> is informally being told of the progress of the negotiations between Great Britain, France, and Italy either by our representatives abroad or by the representatives of those countries in Washington.

> The decision reached to postpone the Lausanne conference, it is said in reliable quarters, was not due exclusively to any precarious situation of the Laval Cabinet or to the desire of postponing the reparations question until after the elections in France and in Germany but mainly to the fact that the principal creditor nations of Germany had become convinced their principal debtor will not or can not pay reparations any longer.

Now, Mr. Chairman, listen to this:

> The conversations between London, Paris, and Rome are reliably reported as not dealing with the fact of whether America's debtors will or will not pay their debts but only with the best methods to stop any further payments to this country.
> There are two schools of thought in Europe to-day. One is that each nation should approach the United States individually, and after putting before the administration the financial situation of each country, to ask for a cancellation of the debts. * * *
> It is reported that most of the European nations with the exception of France are in favor of such a solution. France finds this humiliating, however. Her leaders do not think it would be dignified for important European nations to present to the American Congress their balance sheets and ask, hat in hand, this country for a reduction or cancellation of debts.
> The second theory being discussed between the European chancelleries is that the European nations reach a common agreement and a final decision not to pay a cent of their debts to the United States as long as Germany is not paying reparations. When the unity of action has been agreed upon the United States should be informed and told that from a certain date after July 1 the European powers will no longer be able to pay us any further installments on the war debts. * * *
> * * * Much as European governments, such as those of Great Britain or Italy, dislike to be defaulting, there seems to be a popular tendency to tell the Americans where they get off, and to force their respective (European) governments to act in a way they were heretofore disinclined to do.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us refer to another article, appearing in the Washington Herald of January 21, dealing with the intended default of the international debts. It says:

> The United States is largely responsible for the abandonment of the Lausanne reparations conference, it was admitted in official circles yesterday.
> Administration officials were pleased because it removes the major issue of acting on a direct request for extension of the moratorium or the reduction of the war debt from the forthcoming presidential campaign. Officials point out that the next war-debt payment is not due until December 15, and the election will be over.

Mr. Chairman, if that statement is true, those administration officials offered a gross insult to every man, woman, and child in this country. While the President insists that he is against any further debt cancellation—for reductions are merely cancellation on the installment plan, cutting off the dog's tail by inches—his officials chortle in glee that the issue will not come until "the presidential election is over." We are told that we are to be deceived, anesthetized by false promises, until we have voted. We are to be soothed until after we have cast our votes without one chance to register our emphatic disapproval of this course—and then the final act in this scrapping of international honor is to be staged.

We have heard much, Mr. Chairman, in the last few weeks of the private loans to foreign governments by our international bankers, who were draining the gold from every nook and cranny of our own country and giving us in exchange foreign bonds which testimony before the Senate Finance Committee has proved those international bankers must have known and did know were to prove practically worthless, while the State Department stood silently by watching the plundering of our own people.

We have heard of sums amounting to six billions, then eight billions, mentioned as having been secured for Central and South American nations, for the European nations, for nearly every nation on the globe, by means of exchanging worthless bonds for our good dollars. That is not the whole of the story. The sum of private loans and investments fostered by our international bankers and foisted upon our country banks and investors for profit is more than seventeen and one-half billions of dollars, according to outstanding authorities.

That sum added to the amount loaned by this Government to European countries after the war and not including the amounts loaned those countries during hostilities amounts to more than $29,000,000,000. Add to that the one and a half billions of gold loans of last summer forced by the Hoover moratorium, and the total is up to more than thirty and a half billions.

Add to that the debts already canceled, the vast amounts of supplies given foreign countries, and the tremendous sums given for Mr. Hoover's world-feeding projects—one of which is still in operation according to last accounts (Food Relief Administration, with headquarters in New York City, which received $100,000,000 appropriation from Congress, collected another $150,000,000 from private sources, and recently gave a large sum to a Quaker society for relief of miners)—and you have a total exceeding $40,000,000,000 of American gold sent into the nations of the world since 1914 by our Government and our international bankers, or about 10 per cent of our total national wealth in 1929 before the crash.

In 1914, Mr. Chairman, American private foreign loans and investments totaled a little more than two and one-half billions of dollars. In 1929 those private foreign loans and investments totaled more than fifteen and one-half billions. In 1930 they totaled more than sixteen and a half billions, and in 1931 they totaled more than seventeen and a half billions, while at this date they total, including the loans to the Bank of England and the Reichsbank of Germany, made last summer, more than $19,000,000,000.

The figures of the noted economist, Dr. Max Winkler, show that while foreign governments were demanding and securing cancellations of a large part of their debts to our Government, the international bankers were vying with each other to pour into the eager hands of these same governments and private foreign corporations billions of American money, while this country was approaching starvation in credits.

American business men, Mr. Chairman, were being starved for credit, American railroads were being starved for credit, American industry and American agriculture were being starved for credit, while these international bankers for profits were proceeding to drain from this country its supply of credit and pouring it out abroad and then persuading American banks and American investors to accept in place of their gold worthless foreign bonds and stocks.

In the most shameful, the most brazen, the most wanton, and the most dangerous campaign of stock-and-bond flotations ever perpetrated upon any nation in the history of the world, Mr. Chairman, American international bankers were robbing their own country of credits to export those credits abroad, the while aiding and abetting foreign nations to demand cancellation of the remains of the debt they owed the American people who had been urged to "buy Liberty bonds till it hurts"—and it is still hurting, worse than ever.

Conniving with foreign officials, in some cases paying tremendous commissions to sons of foreign Presidents, these bankers had their agents abroad seeking for opportunities to send American gold into foreign countries for profit, while they knowingly foisted upon their own people worthless foreign bonds and stocks, and at the same time agitated, propagandized, and aided foreign nations to refuse payment of the billions owed to the whole people of this Nation who bought Liberty bonds in a spirit of patriotism and charity.

Think of it, Mr. Chairman, in 1929, the year of the great stock-market crash, international bankers sent into other countries American gold credits in the sum of $1,465,958,000, and in 1930, when America was prostrate under the blow caused by the collapse of the speculative orgy, those same bankers sent American gold credits into foreign countries in the sum of $1,550,056,000, or 5.74 per cent more than in 1929. Our banks were failing in this country by the hundreds; factories were closing down; a great cry was going up from our people, "Give us work, give us bread"; and bankers and politicians were answering, "Billions for credits abroad, but not a dollar for doles at home!"

How could the international bankers close their eyes in 1929 and 1930, Mr. Chairman, to the fact that since 1928 the total number of governments in default on their private or public debts increased from 67 to 283?

How could the international bankers peddling those worthless foreign stocks and bonds close their eyes to the fact that the countries of Europe by their aid and encouragement were preparing to do what those countries now say they will do next December "after our presidential election is over"—"tell Americans where to get off," and default the debts without "humiliation" of having to tell us the reason why?

Do these international bankers admit, now that they have been exposed, that they were "unwise" in thus sending into other countries the gold credits they denied their own people? Ah, yes, Mr. Chairman; they have admitted it in the hearings before the Senate Finance Committee—and have sought to apologize and to explain away their guilt in this infamous rape on American prosperity.

Here is what B. C. Forbes says about that in an article published in Washington on the 19th of this month:

> American money will not be sent out of the country as thoughtlessly, shortsightedly, recklessly as before.
> I learn that leading bankers handling foreign loans decided some time ago that their methods must be reformed, and that an informal agreement to accomplish this end was reached.

Ah, yes, Mr. Chairman, now that the ruin is wrought, now that Judas is exposed, he begins publicly to reform.

Let us continue to read:

> Crossing the Atlantic with a business getter for a New York financial concern, I got from him three years ago a rather astounding picture of what was then going on. New York had men drumming up loans in foreign countries, each competing with all the others in offering alluring terms to prospective borrowers.
> Whenever intimation spread that a country or municipality or a large corporation was receptive to the idea of borrowing money here (in the United States), a swarm of scouts from American underwriters flocked to the spot like bees around honey.

One wonders, Mr. Chairman, why the American country banks and American investors could not have been told this in 1928.

Now listen to further observations of this noted economist and financial writer in the same article:

> This country has had no association or organization charged with any responsibility for seeing to it that American investors received a square deal when buying foreign securities sponsored by our own bankers.

Why should we need any association or organization to assure American investors a square deal other than the bankers themselves—if they were the right kind of bankers?

Too many institutions and firms, it is now discernible, were governed mainly by an itch to bag commissions. There was not enough thought or study given to the probable outcome of the unrestricted lending to all and sundry in any and every part of the globe. * * * Unfortunately, the move to correct the foreign-financing evil was not made until unconscionable damage had been done. Whether Congress will consider that the wholly unofficial understanding or agreement among the bankers can be counted upon to prevent future abuses remains to be seen.

If restrictive legislation be passed, the bankers will have nobody to blame but themselves.

I for one, Mr. Chairman, say that any group of international bankers who would do to the banks and to the investors and to the people of this country what these international bankers have done are not to be trusted to reform. They are not to be trusted to refrain from again indulging in a reckless, unconscionable, fatal orgy of foreign loans and investments if the rewards of fat profits beckon them. Let us, by all means, have restrictive legislation that will adequately protect the banks and the people of this country from these raids upon our credit.

And now, Mr. Chairman, what of the moratorium? What of the billion and a half of loans made last summer to the Bank of England, to the Reichsbank of Germany?

Why, sir, at the very moment we were going to the rescue of the Allies when they faced defeat at the hands of the central powers they were whispering, "We must never pay these debts."

At the very moment, sir, when we were ministering financially to all the bruised and bleeding countries of Europe after the madness had passed they were whispering among themselves, ally and enemy alike, "We must never pay these debts."

At the palace of Versailles, gathered about the peace table, those nations we succored in their hour of need were scheming and plotting to get as much territory as possible, to get as much damages as possible, and smilling at good old Uncle Sam, whose altruistic principles would not allow him to take 1 cent or 1 foot of territory for his work of rescuing a prostrate Europe, and whispering among themselves, "We must never pay those debts."

In the years following the war, while those same nations were garnering billions of American gold, they were beginning to proclaim in loud chorus, a chorus in which our international bankers joined, "We must never pay those debts!"

And to-day, Mr. Chairman, that cry has reached its crescendo, and all Europe is howling, "Shylock, we will never pay those debts!"

Last summer, according to an article by Garet Garrett in the Saturday Evening Post, at the very moment those same nations were again screaming to us for help to save them from their own insane folly, their ruinous expenditures for armies and armaments with which to wage another war, and at the very moment Mr. Hoover and the international bankers were going to their rescue, the gold honor of the American dollar was being impugned, as it is to-day being impugned in Europe by the very nations we were succoring. Our credit was being impugned by our debtors, and for what reason? Why, says Garrett, because we had been too free with it, precisely for the reason our debtors knew they had borrowed too much on poor security.

We were, he tells us, in the rationally impossible position of debtor nations raiding the gold reserves of a creditor nation while the creditor nation was self-bound under an agreement not to collect its debts from them. That, Mr. Chairman, was the effect of the Hoover moratorium.

We had the strange experience, says this writer further, of being a creditor nation and finding ourselves beholden to one of our principal debtors, that debtor, France, undertaking on grounds of generosity and helpfulness, if you please, to stop raiding the creditor's gold reserves short of the point at which the creditor's gold solvency might seem in jeopardy.

We witnessed the sight, says Garrett, of public ovations in this the creditor country to the premier of one of its principal debtors when he came to tell us that more of Europe's after-war debts must be charged to the American taxpayer in a spirit of international friendship; more public ovations as he departed, saying he had our official promise to consider it.

And while we were laying a burden of $252,566,803 in interest and principal due in 1931 from the debtor countries on the backs of our own overburdened taxpayers, the nationals of England and of Germany were withdrawing that gold as fast as we could send it over. And the moment we stopped sending gold to the Bank of England—England went off the gold standard.

While the Bank of England was passing out to France, to Belgium, to Holland, to Englishmen our gold, did Mr. Edward Charles Grenfell, London partner of Morgan, Grenfell & Co., member of the British Parliament, and a director in the Bank of England, sound any warning to President Hoover and American banks through his firm of J. P. Morgan & Co. of what was being done with the American gold being poured into the Bank of England while we were staggering under hardship and unemployment in this country? He did not.

And did Thomas W. Lamont, when he appeared before the Senate Finance Committee and was asked if any partner of the house of Morgan was connected with any of the foreign banks to whom these loans were made, tell the committee about Mr. Grenfell, member of Parliament and director in the Bank of England? He did not!

And what is happening to-day, Mr. Chairman?

These same European countries are undermining in every possible way the credit of the American dollar.

The Journal of Commerce of January 21 carries the headlines that a new gold outflow to Europe looms, as more than nineteen millions of the yellow metal is shipped to France, Belgium, and England. The article goes on to state that the Bank of France has announced its intention of withdrawing $125,000,000 in earmarked gold it has been carrying for several months in the Federal Reserve Bank of New York. Why? To discredit the American dollar!

That article further makes the startling statement that the short-term European balances remaining in the United States are about $700,000,000 and that they may be withdrawn, while the maximum amount of free gold (not earmarked) left in the Federal reserve banks at present is only $800,000,000.

What is causing this withdrawal? Why, Mr. Chairman, these foreign debtor nations do not like our $2,000,000,000 bank-railroad-insurance company balm bill. They do not like the idea of our Federal reserve system broadening its credit expansion policy, if you please. Owing us more than $30,000,000,000, these debtors of ours are withdrawing their balances because they do not like our loose credit methods. We are too generous, in their eyes, in our loans. We are attempting now to rescue ourselves, therefore it is unsafe for them to keep their gold in our vaults. That is what they say.

The truth of the matter is, Mr. Chairman, they do not want any of this gold we have loaned them in our vaults if next December 15 they default. That is why they are withdrawing their gold, these European nations! They are getting ready to default, therefore this gold must not be where we can reach it.

If and when the European nations tell us flatly and bluntly they are not going to pay any more of their honest debts to our Government, just what do you suppose is going to happen to the private debts of foreign governments and corporations, the securities of which are held in our banks throughout our country and by our American investors in the sum of more than $17,500,000,000?

Why, Mr. Chairman, is there a Member of this august body who believes for an instant that if these governments so far forget their national honor and integrity as to default obligations based upon the most solemn and sacred covenants between nations, that they will hesitate for a moment to default on the greater sum owed by them to American banks and investors who have no one, not even the power of their own Government, to try to prevent it? Of course not. If and when those foreign nations default their debts to this Government, they will with impunity default the private debts.

I might continue at greater length upon the preparations for this default, but I desire to address myself for a moment to another phase.

Europe is serving notice on us that she does not intend to pay.

Europe is serving notice on us that she will drive us from the gold standard if she can.

Europe is serving notice on us that she, too, can erect tariff bars to keep us out of the markets of the world.

Europe is serving notice on us that she will not disarm, but that she will continue to make stupendous expenditures for armies and armaments in preparation for the next great war—and with whom?

Therefore we are faced with these problems: Either we must grant indefinite moratoriums, which means eventual cancellation, or we must agree to extreme reductions, which is cancellation in part; we must cancel the whole debt or we must force those European countries to stand before the world stripped of false raiment of virtue and integrity and naked in their disregard for their national honor or their international obligations. What are we going to do?

If I believed those nations, when they had forced us to cancel these honest debts due the American people, would then pay their private loans to American banks and investors, that might possibly be another question, although I would still oppose cancellation. But I do not believe that. I do believe that if we canceled those governmental debts to-morrow and threw upon the backs of our already crushed people the burden of that debt those foreign governments would, before six months, default on every private debt they owe our banks and our investors.

Therefore I, for one, am in favor of refusing to cut or to cancel those debts, and if those European nations default—then that will put a stop to our international bankers sending more of our gold into the rest of the world at the expense of our own industries, our own agriculture, our own people.

We may as well meet this issue courageously and with honor, for within ourselves lies the power of our recovery. Our salvation is in self-containment.

Within our own borders lies 93 per cent of our market for our own products.

In the 6-hour day lies our hope of affording employment to our now despairing workless millions.

Redistribution of wealth is another step toward recovery.

Rectification of our credit structure and restoration of credit control to the Congress and its removal from the hands of the international bankers is another necessary step.

We face the future sad but unafraid. This great Nation, this Government of, for, and by the people can not perish from the earth. We can withstand this shock of default by Europe. We can weather the storm. Our people are courageous, they are patient, they are intelligent, and they are worthy of a better fate than the rest of the world would award them. So we will not go down in despair if we will take care of our own, if we will turn our eyes and our efforts to our own welfare, instead of helping all the world and neglecting our own needy ones.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. McKEOWN].

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, the bill I propose to discuss is an exact copy of a bill introduced by Hon. William H. Murray in the Sixty-third Congress, and discussed by him in this House on October 19, 1914, as shown in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 51, Appendix, page 1189.

During and after every big financial crisis in this country and England there has been an endeavor on the part of the lawmakers, at the behest of the bankers to pass legislation to relieve them of the consequences of the depression, which they had themselves oftentimes brought about. A notable example of this was after the great financial crisis in England in 1825. Sir Robert Peel, in a zealous endeavor to straighten out the errors of the banking situation in England was undertaking to foster upon the banks of Scotland the ideas of the English bankers and economists by preventing the issuing of notes less than 5 pounds. This action on his part first brought the Scottish banking system to the attention of the world and showed the amazing fact that although Scotland was the poorest and most barren country in soil, without resources of any character and without gold, had since the establishment of the Scottish bank by Mr. Patterson, founder of the Bank of England, developed tremendously, not only in agriculture, but in fisheries, livestock, and manufacturing, and all this due to the plan and policy pursued by the Scottish bank which issued its notes and extended its credit to the farmers, merchants, manufacturers, and all the various industries. These bank notes were accepted and used throughout Scotland, although not legal tender. They were for use only within the boundaries of Scotland and were preferred by the people of Scotland rather than specie for money.

The English bankers, having discovered this unusual prosperity in Scotland under this banking system, undertook to hamper and get a hold on the Scottish banking system and through the great Robert Peel undertook to abolish all small notes under 5 pounds. This act on the part of the British Parliament was resisted by all the force of the Scottish people, and in the defeat of this plan Sir Walter Scott was a leading figure.

When the next financial crisis arose, brought about by the Jacobine insurrection, the value of gold rose rapidly; and the Scottish banks in order to protect themselves, suspended the payment in specie on the presentment of their notes and issued six-month notes bearing 5 per cent interest, and by this means rode through the crisis, maintaining its currency at par.

The Scottish banking idea is based on the idea of mutual benefits from the community to the bank, and the bank to the community, and consists of a large central bank, but with branches centrally located in communities to afford banking facilities to every 4,000 inhabitants. There was no limitation of liabilities to stockholders in Scottish banks. Not a single penny was exempt against the depositors and note holders in case of failure. The cash-credit system adopted by the Scottish banks was the one that produced prosperity in the country and established public confidence in the integrity of the bank. After all, public confidence in truth is the fundamental principle on which any banking system must rest; and unless you are able to secure this public confidence, no banking system, however wisely designed, would be expected to enjoy permanent success; and although the champions of the Federal reserve banking system of this country declared on all occasions that there could be no monetary panics in these United States, their prophecies were false and at the present moment we are undergoing the greatest financial panic that we have ever had in the history of our country. The Federal reserve banking system was wisely designed and ably constructed and weathered the storms of the Great World War, carrying us safely through those perilous days. But shortly after the return of our victorious Army and America resumed its daily task of rehabilitation, the Federal reserve banking system fell into evil days; and instead of functioning as was the intention of its makers—the Congress of the United States—it became the tool of the gigantic speculative interests of the country, who disregarded all the laws of economics and, forgetful of the true purposes of a great banking system, turned the Federal reserve system into the hands of those who, actuated by avarice and greed, immediately commenced the policy of staying credits to those who produce and to furnish credit to those who speculate. When the flow of credit to the manufacturer is stopped he is forced to discharge his workers, who must find employment and subsistence elsewhere.

When credit is denied the farmer, he undertakes to increase his crop in order to make enough of his products to pay off his obligations, and it is an indisputable fact that in the history of world banking whenever you curtail the credit and medium of exchange to the manufacturers and farmers of a country that it has been immediately followed by a glut of agricultural products. So it is in the present financial crisis. As a result of the unjustifiable curtailment of credits by the present banking system of the United States, there followed immediately a glut of agricultural products; and you can establish all the boards, cooperative organizations, and curtail the productions of agricultural products that you please, but you will not have touched the cause nor corrected the evil until you bring about a renewal and reexpansion of credits and money. Mr. Patterson, who established the Bank of England, established a great central bank system in the British Empire, suitable to the requirements and needs of that great country. On account of its great commercial trade, its import and export trade, a banking system suitable to the commercial needs of that great country, he was careful that no lenders of money for short terms on commercial paper were allowed to serve on the board of directors. Eight of the directors retire every year. It is customary to choose young men to fill vacancies on the board so that they will still possess good health when advanced on the board of governors. It is a rare thing that a director is made a governor out of his turn, or that he ever served more than two years on the board.

When he came to the establishment of the Scottish bank he found a wholly different situation existing there from that existing in England. Scotland was a rough and rugged country of poor soil and poor people, scattered over rough mountain country with very restricted means of transportation. She had no foreign trade or commerce and no well-established industry. The English system contemplated the expansion of its notes and currency throughout the world, and its great magnet of attraction would be the mother bank of England, where the specie and money of the world would center. The Scottish banking system contemplated that the notes of the Bank of Scotland would circulate only within Scotland and in its various communities, the circulation of which would expand and contract through the various seasons of the year as the commerce would expand through the seasons. Based upon the idea that it would inflate when inflation was needed and deflate when deflation was required.

Since our banking system has resulted in draining the far reaches of the South and West of its coin and circulating medium into the great money centers of the North and East, it naturally follows that now is the time for the Congress of these United States to repeal the 10 per cent tax placed on bank issues in 1875, a scheme that was promulgated by avaricious bankers of the East to get control of the whole banking system of the United States. Now is the time to strike from the board of control of the Federal reserve system every man who is engaged in international banking and lending money to the speculators and gamblers of this country. Such men have no place on such a board, where they are able to control the lifeblood and life commerce of this country. The record discloses the fact that the international bankers of this country have sold the confidence of the great American public for paltry dollars, and for profit they have been willing to sell the depreciated bonds of foreign governments for good American dollars, sending the money abroad, while manufacturing, forestry, livestock raising, and farming industries have been left drained dry and to grovel in the dust of humility and financial distress. Conduct of that kind and character in times like these convert men to the "no-bank" idea, so courageously and vigorously advocated by that great man and Democrat, Andrew Jackson. We had State bank issues prior to 1875. Some of it was wildcat; and although the worshipers of gold throw up their hands in holy terror at the mention of State-bank issue, yet these systems grew and the States in which they existed were able to prosper in spite of the cornering of gold in Wall Street. The gold-standard worshipers are but the competitors of the old goldsmiths of the past.

The two outstanding features of the Scottish bank system are the principle of cash credits and note issue.

The principle of cash credits is somewhat akin to letters of credit or guaranty of credit in vogue years ago in banks of this country. Cash credit simply means that where a person is not possessed of sufficient cash to do business but has the confidence and acquaintance of other persons of good repute, he could have an open account in his name on which he could borrow up to a fixed amount, say, $2,000 or $2,500 over and above the amount which he might be able to pay into his credit. In other words, if a tradesman or farmer should get $2,500 to operate his business upon the indorsement of two or more good sureties the bank would extend him credit. The liabilities of the sureties were limited to the $2,500. In other words, the farmer or tradesman would attain a letter of credit and make his deposits from time to time, and he was not required to pay interest on the total amount of credit at the bank, but only paid interest on the amount due the bank each day, and the bank allowed him interest on his daily balance, so that this arrangement would enable many worthy and honest people to enter trade or business and engage in commerce who otherwise would not have been able to do so on account of lack of finances and under such an arrangement that he would not be overburdened with interest charges. Under the present banking system in this country you are compelled to pay interest on the full amount of the loan of $2,500 and receive no interest on your deposit. Under proper safeguards such as I have put in my resolution State banks would be enabled to issue their notes which would circulate in their communities.

In the early history of the country, under the State laws, there were various forms of notes issued by the banks with all kinds and degrees of success and failure. This was during the earliest development of the country between the Revolutionary and the Civil Wars. America was an undeveloped wilderness, a new country, poor in specie and loanable capital, and therefore was forced by the necessity of her situation to adopt some monetary devices which would not be tolerated under more favorable conditions.

There was the banking system of New England, including the noted case of the Bank of Suffolk, of Massachusetts, which issued its notes against general assets and organized a clearing house for note redemption for banks in New England.

Bankers have always sought special favoritism from the lawmaking bodies. Take the example of the banks of Rhode Island. They were granted by the legislature special facilities for collecting their debts. It was provided that, upon a note or other instrument made payable at the bank, in case of default in payment the president or directors might cause demand to be made, and in case of his failure to make payment, that without suit or judgment against the borrower, these officers could go to the proper officers of the court and have an execution issued or an attachment of real estate levied. Of course, this "bank process" immediately brought great resentment on the part of the public and was finally set aside. Under this special favor the banks of Rhode Island made great progress and gain.

Then we had the New York bank system known as the "free banking system," under Governor Van Buren, and under him the "safety-fund plan" was inaugurated. It was suggested no doubt by the regulation of Chinese merchants who, by grant of the Chinese Government, had the exclusive right of trading with foreigners, but all were made liable in case of failure of any one of them. In other words, this was the first bank guaranty law.

You will note that all banks in New England and New York were banks of issue, the amount of their note issue being safeguarded from time to time by the laws of their several States. Under the "free bank act" of New York all persons were given the right to engage in the issuing of notes, which were obtained from the State comptroller upon depositing with him the bonds of the United States, of the State of New York, or of any other State approved by the comptroller. Notes could also be issued on bonds and mortgages on improved real estate worth double the amount secured by the mortgage, and the notes had to show that they were secured by bonds or mortgages, and by which secured.

In Ohio they had branch banks, each branch bank being required to deposit with the mother bank 10 per cent of the amount of its circulating notes. Each branch was liable for the circulation but not for the other liabilities of the other branches. The State bank of Ohio was eminently successful, as was the State bank of Indiana.

In the State of Michigan the safety fund law was ignored. Wildcat banking followed, and as a result there were a great many bank failures, and by 1844 nearly all of the free banks were in the hands of receivers. In 1851 Illinois passed a banking law permitting the issuing of notes on securities, and this was followed by other States. The restrictions imposed by New York were disregarded in the West, and as a result wildcat notes were issued. A great many banks were created, owned, and managed by the State. Under the Federal Constitution no State was permitted to "emit bills of credit" and it was decided in the case of Craig against the State of Missouri that certificates issued by the State and made receivable for salaries and taxes, even though not full legal tender, were unconstitutional, but in the case of Brisco against the bank of the Commonwealth of Kentucky it was decided by a majority of the court that there was a distinction in a case where the bills were issued by a bank under the control of a president and board of directors and that the notes were not bills of credit within the inhibition of the Constitution, which included only paper issued by the authority of a State on the faith of the State and designed to circulate as money.

A unique political question opened in Kentucky in 1820 by the enactment of the replevin law, which gave debtors two years within which to redeem their goods, unless payment was accepted by creditors in notes of the Bank of the Commonwealth. This led to a fierce political campaign and one of the judges of the district court declared the law unconstitutional, which was upheld upon appeal. An extra session of the legislature was called in an effort to remove the judge, and this was followed by the election in 1824 of a legislature that repealed all the laws concerning the appellate court and created a new court of appeals, and for awhile the State of Kentucky had two systems of courts at the same time. At the next general election they changed their mood and enacted a law repealing the new court.

The Bank of Indiana stands out as a notable example of sound State banking and was able to ride safely through the storm of bank failures which occurred during the time of its existence. The Bank of Indiana had a large note circulation, but it was based on liquid assets. The bank weathered the crisis of 1857 without suspending specie payments and retired its circulation when gold went to a premium in 1862, and went out of business only upon the imposition of the 10 per cent tax. And when it wound up its affairs it had ample assets and unimpaired credit.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I take great pleasure in yielding 10 minutes to the distinguished gentleman from Oklahoma. [Applause.]

Mr. McKEOWN. I thank the gentleman.

The suspension of specie payments at the outbreak of the Civil War drove gold and silver from circulation and required an expansion of bank-note issues to maintain the volume of the currency. The Suffolk bank system of New England continued in operation at Boston, but the notes failed to flow in as rapidly as before for redemption.

While much prejudice had been engendered in the minds of the people of this country on account of the unhappy memories of some State bank issues, the only really practical defect, taking the country as a whole, was its lack of uniformity.

Those State banks that issued currency against general assets, such as those of New England, Indiana, and Louisiana, compared with banks issuing notes against securities like the banks of Illinois, New York, Wisconsin, and banks established under the charge of States, demonstrate the success of banks issuing notes against general assets as against the failure of banks issuing the circulation based on securities.

The history of State banking systems is the history of the success based on the issue of notes upon general assets as against the failure of the systems based on the depositing of securities, like the national banking system.

Banks in Canada, using a somewhat similar system to that engaged in by the successful State banking systems, have had but few failures, while the bank failures in the United States in the same length of time have amounted into the thousands.

Prior to the Civil War the banks of New Orleans were perhaps the greatest banking institutions of the country, with the possible exception of the banks of New York. The banks of New Orleans were able to hold their notes at par through the panic of 1857 and on through the Civil War, although the Confederate Government fell.

The New Orleans banks were required to divide their loans in two classes—those made from capital and those made from deposits. Loans from capital were permitted to be made on mortgages and other investments beyond 90 days. Deposit loans were restricted to 90-day nonrenewable paper, and the banks were prohibited from speculating or dealing in any products. In addition to this they were required to have 33⅓ per cent reserved against their circulating notes.

For at least 20 years in the State of Iowa there was a great fight against the establishment of State banks.

In the State of Illinois, after the collapse of the banks following the panic of 1837, paper-issue banks ceased to exist between 1843 and 1851.

As early as 1848 agitation was commenced by the recommendation of Millard Fillmore, then Comptroller of the Currency of New York, who recommended that Congress issue notes to be secured by stocks of the United States, to be received for public dues to the National Treasury.

This was followed in 1861 with a revival of the Fillmore suggestion by one Laurent Bonnefoux, with the exception that the security was limited to New York stocks.

In 1861 Silas M. Stilwell took an active part in presenting this proposition to Mr. Salmon P. Chase, Secretary of the Treasury.

When the national-banking system was proposed it was called a monopoly by the economist Henry C. Carey, for placing a limit on bank-note circulation, and the term "Money Trust" was heard long after the limitation was removed.

The fundamental principle of the national-banking system was a note issue secured by a deposit of bonds with the Comptroller of the Currency. This principle was derived from the New York system, and was often imitated by other States. The banker had merely to deposit bonds or other securities which provided a productive investment and at the time protected his notes.

The problem of agricultural credit was never taken into consideration in the establishment of the national banking system and, in my judgment, has never been taken into consideration until the establishment of the Federal land banks and agricultural credit banks. Agricultural credit was amply cared for under the New Orleans banking system, where capital loans were made to make long-time loans, whereas the deposit loans were limited to 90-day nonrenewable paper.

One of the most objectionable features to the bond-secured note issue is its inherent inelasticity. This was disclosed in the experience of the New York system in the fifties when, in a period of rising business cycle, capital was attracted to more productive investment than the purchase of bonds upon which to issue paper money.

My proposal is to repeal the 10 per cent tax on State bank issues with a proviso that would require State banks issue to be properly safeguarded and protected. This tax was passed for the sole and only purpose of making all the banks in the United States come in under the national banking system, enacted in 1865, and has long since accomplished that purpose; and under the Federal reserve banking system in vogue now it is provided that all national banks shall be members of the Federal reserve system, and there is no further necessity for this obsolete prohibitory statute, which, to my mind, has worked to the great detriment of the financial welfare of the people of the South and West.

The New England States have, since the creation of the Government, been the center of great wealth and the congregation of the money of the country, and will continue to be so, and when the money of the far reaches of the West and South are drained into this portion of America hard times and panics, with financial distress, are inevitable. It is felt first in the places from which the money comes, the West and South, and is reflected in the falling off of the purchase of goods, wares, and merchandise from the manufacturers in the industrial part of the country, and then the closing down of factories follows in the industrial section of the country.

A careful study of the history of financial panics will bring one to the conclusion that a deflation of the circulating medium of exchange in a country is invariably followed by a glutted market for agricultural products. That is true to-day. We have one of the greatest gluts in agricultural products to-day. Instead of wasting our money in ineffective methods of relieving the glut, it is my sober judgment that we should immediately expand the medium of currency by permitting the establishing of safe and sound State banks of issue in the sovereign States.

The act was first passed on the 13th day of July, 1866, at a time when the South had no representation in the Congress, and was not made effective until 1875. The constitutionality of the act was tested in the case of the Veasie Bank, of Maine, v. Fenno (8 Wall. 533), and remarkable as it may seem, the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court at that time was Judge Salmon P. Chase, who while Secretary of the Treasury recommended the passage of the bill to Congress. By a majority opinion the court sustained the constitutionality of the act.

In the light of the recent child labor case (257 U. S. 520), in which Chief Justice Taft held that Congress had no power to prohibit child labor through a tax, it would lead the average citizen to the conclusion that either the Supreme Court was right when it decided the Veasie Bank case and wrong in the child labor case, or right in the child labor case and wrong in the Veasie Bank case.

The purpose of a tax in the Veasie case was to destroy State banks of issue, and Chief Justice Taft draws a distinction between the two cases on the ground that Congress has the power to coin money and regulate the value thereof, which involved the incidental power to destroy State banks of issue.

There is no authority vested in Congress by the Constitution to issue notes. There remains no good reason why this act should not be repealed. The repeal of this act was one of the outstanding planks in the Democratic platform of 1892, on which Grover Cleveland was elected, and no doubt would have been in the platform of 1896 but for the silver issue; and if this Congress fails to repeal it, it will no doubt be an issue in 1932.

With the repeal of this act let us see what good occurs: First, the sovereign States wouldhave restored their ancient and undisputed right to have State banks of issue within their borders.

The control of the medium of circulation, which is the lifeblood of commerce throughout the Union, would be taken away from the hands of the few. The passage of the resolution which I have introduced would not bring about a lot of wildcat note issues or shinplasters, because my resolution, in the repeal of the 10 per cent tax, limits the repeal to such State banks or bank associations where their notes do not exceed the capital stock of the bank, and all the assets of the bank are liable for the redemption of such notes, provided that an amount shall be held in reserve for the redemption of such notes equal to $1 to every $3 of such notes so issued, and any State by legislative enactment may authorize such notes for circulation by any person, firm, association, corporation, State bank, or State banking association, upon State, county, township, or municipal bonds or bonds lawfully issued by legally organized drainage or irrigation districts, or associations, not to exceed 75 per cent of the par value of such bonds; provided that 15 per cent in gold of the face value of such notes for circulation shall be held and maintained in reserve at all times for the redemption of such notes; and provided further, that any State may, by legislative enactment, authorize such notes for circulation by any person, firm, association, corporation, State bank, or State banking association upon any staple product of the farm, field, or mine when the same shall have been fully insured against fire or deterioration in value or loss; provided further, that there is held and maintained in reserve at all times 15 per cent in gold of the face value of such notes for redemption of the same, and that such notes as herein authorized shall be exempt from all taxes and penalties otherwise prescribed by the act of February 8, 1875.

It can be readily seen by this action on the part of Congress that States that now suffer from a lack of circulation, such as Oklahoma and Texas and other Southern and Western States, could relieve themselves of their present calamity in business with a currency that would circulate only within the State and business would proceed and the country would soon be rehabilitated. Although I am unwilling to assume the rôle of a prophet and proclaim, as has been said by champions of other banking systems, that we would never have another panic, I am certain that the poor and undeveloped regions of this country under this system would be given a fair and equal opportunity to grow and develop and their people enjoy the share of the prosperity of the Nation to which they are entitled. [Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. CELLER]. [Applause.]

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Chairman, undoubtedly our present economic plight and difficulty is traceable, mainly, to the World War, which destroyed the European balance of trade and credit, and transformed us, an erstwhile debtor nation, into a creditor nation. As a debtor nation we enjoyed a very active, lucrative export trade with countries the world over. This trade, resulting as it did in an inflation of real-estate values and commodity prices, caused also an expansion in agriculture and finance. We exported vast quantities of cotton, wheat, lumber, as well as many other commodities, and with these exports we paid the debts we owed abroad.

That is now all passed; we have become a creditor nation, owing no one any money, and with practically all the nations owing us money. These debtor nations do not, however, come to our ports for our surplus cotton, wheat, lumber, and manufactured products, since they have not the wherewithal to pay for same. This state of affairs can be remedied in one of two ways—either by our loaning these nations the money with which to purchase our products or by our taking their goods and articles in exchange for our own.

We have loaned these nations approximately two billions of dollars, and we can not loan them any more. In fact, our people have no more money to invest in foreign securities. On the other hand, Europe is unable to pay us in world goods, since we have put up so high a tariff rate and barrier that it is well-nigh impossible for them to send us their goods.

It is fundamental that to sell abroad you must buy abroad. The Secretary of Commerce, Mr. Lamont, in his annual report shows this most readily by the figures of the American foreign trade, taken for the years 1910-1914; then for the postwar period, 1922–1926; and then for the period of the depression up to June 30, 1931.

These records indicate that during the pre-war period, when our exports were twice the amount of our exports of the postwar years, our imports during the former period were similarly twice the amount of those during the latter period. Furthermore during the depression period, when our exports fell off about one-third, our imports fell off about one-third. In other words, during these several periods of time our imports practically balanced our exports and our exports practically balanced our imports, all of which gives further proof of the inescapable truth that selling and buying compensate each other. And so I repeat, to export we must import, and to import we must export. Even Mr. Hoover realized this, for in 1921, when he was Secretary of Commerce and when the economic and industrial conditions in this country and abroad were still chaotic as a result of the lack of economic recovery from the war, he made a notable address at the National Shoe and Leather Exposition, and there stated these vital truths about foreign trade:

I may say in passing that our whole standard of living greatly depends upon our imports, and our exports are the great balance wheel for our productions. Exports are vital to the stabilization of our industries, of price levels, of wages, and of employment. While many of the causes of the present depression lie within our own borders, yet there may be no recovery from these hard times for many years to come if we neglect our economic relations abroad.

Those words, my good friends, were uttered in 1921. Mr. Hoover was not then President, and the views of high protectionism had not then had time to have their deadly effect on him. He sang an entirely different tune when he signed the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill, which not only imposed enormous burdens on our consumers but also reduced our trade within 17 months after its passage $5,326,000,000. This was an inevitable result, since with high rates Europe could not ship goods to us and, correspondingly, could not buy from us. Thus in a recent report submitted by the Committee on Ways and Means we find the following:

That this widespread depression has been aggravated by the high and, in many instances, prohibitive rates of the tariff act of 1930 can not be successfully denied. The foreign and domestic trade data furnished by the statistical division of the Department of Commerce on January 7, 1932, recites that for 17 months prior to July 1, 1930, our exports were $6,829,000,000; for the same period our imports were $5,766,000,000; our total exports and imports were $12,595,000,000.

The tariff act of 1930 was approved June 17, 1930.

For 17 months since July 1, 1930, our exports have decreased from $6,829,000,000 to $4,007,000,000. During the same period our imports have decreased from $5,766,000,000 to $3,262,000,000 and our total exports and imports have decreased from $12,595,000,000 to $7,269,000,000, making a total decrease of exports and imports for 17 months after the passage of the tariff act of June 17, 1930, of $5,326,000,000.

This has resulted in the accumulation of huge surpluses of both manufactured articles and agricultural commodities for which there is no market.

It is, indeed, pertinent to ask what Mr. Hoover has done to improve our economic relations abroad; what has he done to increase the amount of goods imported from abroad, to enable the foreign nations to buy more from us? It is pertinent to say, in answer, that he has done his level best to destroy our economic relations abroad and to hamper and hinder the freedom of trade and intercourse with other nations, by his espousal of the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill, and of anything else that calls for the highest kind of protection.

We may further inquire as to what plan, if any, has the administration devised to get rid of our excess products—60 per cent in cotton, 255 per cent in wheat, 535 per cent in rye, 405 per cent in tobacco, 305 per cent in lard, 30 to 35 per cent in petroleum. These surpluses must be sold abroad if business is to revive; yet they simply can not be marketed, because most of the nations are incensed by our extortionist tariff, and have therefore set up their own high tariff barriers.

Thus, our automobile companies, making a half million cars per year for export purposes, our petroleum, leather goods, textile and cotton industries, our electrical-appliances manufacturers, paint, hosiery, and many other industries, looking for wide markets to sell their wares, now find themselves confronted with retaliatory tariffs everywhere. Our tariff walls beget other tariff walls; the channels of trade become blocked; business assets become frozen. Surely some statesman, some national figure—it ought to be Mr. Hoover—should come forward with a plan to open up these channels of trade and thaw out the frozen conditions of world commerce.

About a week ago a very significant article appeared in the metropolitan press. Quoting from that article, we find:

The British Government's imposition of a general tariff, coming within a fortnight, will be followed by a bold and far-reaching attempt to bring down the tariff walls against British goods all over the world.

The Government contemplates not only a tariff of give and take with the Dominions, but will try to win preferential entry for British products into all the so-called "sterling" countries which followed Britain in going off the gold standard.

It will begin with Denmark and Argentina, which are more closely bound to Britain economically than some of the Dominions themselves. Ultimately it is hoped Holland, Sweden, Norway, Egypt, and others will come into the scheme.

A significant hint came to-day from J. H. Thomas, Secretary of State for the Dominions, that the Government would open discussions with foreign countries even before the opening of the Dominions conference at Ottawa in July. Mr. Thomas promised there would be "no negotiations that would prejudice free and unfettered negotiations at Ottawa," but left the door open for immediate talks with the countries outside of the British Empire which come wihin Britain's economic orbit.

In effect, these discussions will mark the beginning of a powerful drive against most-favored-nation treaties everywhere. Under existing commercial treaties the products of the high tariff of the United States are admitted into Argentina and Scandinavia on exactly the same terms as the goods of the low tariff of Britain.

After the new British tariff is imposed, and its imposition by the end of next week is regarded as likely, invitations will be issued to foreign countries to come in under the British tariff wall if they grant corresponding favors to British goods in their own markets.

* * * In the case of Argentina it will be an invitation, backed by a weapon of tariff, to transfer her purchases of manufactured goods from the United States to Britain.

Overtures have thus been made—and they have undoubtedly been made through diplomatic channels—for our country to negotiate some sort of tariff reciprocity with England. But up to this hour we have heard nothing from the White House or from the administration in this regard. And in the meanwhile the new British tariff bears heavier and heavier on our exports. Forty-six per cent of our annual exports will have to pay new duties under the general levy of a 10 per cent increase on practically all American-made goods and commodities, effective March 1, 1932. This 10 per cent increase will be paid by 46 per cent of America's annual sales to England, which in 1930 was equal to $672,-181,000. (Legislative reference service, Library of Congress.)

By a specific provision of Parliament the Dominions of Great Britain are exempt from the application of the new 10 per cent law. At the imperial conference, to be held next July at Ottawa, the question of the preferential treatment of empire-made products, to and from the dominions, will be discussed. Under ordinary conditions, a 10 per cent increase in England on American-made goods might invoke no difficulty; but since England is off the gold standard, the purchasers of American exports in England are required to pay substantially more for American products, in terms of depreciated sterling than they would have been required to pay if England were on the gold standard. Add to this the increase of 10 per cent, the inflated commodity prices caused by debased English currency, and you strike confusion in the hearts of the American exporters to England. Furthermore, a thoroughly chauvinistic policy, going, as it does, hand in hand with our high protective tariff, has intensified the campaign, now rampant in England, of buying only British-made goods.

There is, moreover, another disastrous effect of our high-tariff policy that must not be lost sight of, and that is the veritable flight of American industries to Canada and Europe. In their endeavor to escape the devastating effects of the retaliatory tariffs of England and Canada, American industries have been erecting plants in foreign lands. Nor can we censor them for this; for they must do business and must have an outlet for their capital, and since we discourage the operation of their plants here, they go abroad.

According to Dr. James Harvey Rogers, of Yale, the expatriation of American industry has been rapid and devastating as the result of our tariffs. By the end of 1929 American investments in factories abroad reached $1,813,000,000. Approximately 45 per cent of this sum was invested in Canada, 35 per cent in Europe, and the rest in Latin America and Asia.

Some 1,500 plants, American except for American pay rolls and American raw materials, now operate in Canada. In Europe there are 453 American branch factories employing European workers, while millions of American workers roam the streets. As pointed out by Doctor Rogers, to escape retaliatory foreign tariffs provoked by the Hawley-Smoot law, our industrialists moved their plants in under the foreign walls.

In this migratory movement, to the stimulus of foreign tariff barriers is apparently added that of our own—

Writes Doctor Rogers in his book, America Weighs Her Gold—

Thus, because of our own tariff walls and because of others largely provoked by our own, the resulting handicaps to our export trade are leading to the export of our industries themselves; and, in general, it is our most progressive industries which are first to find this avenue of escape.

Furthermore, in migrating they are carrying with them not only American machinery, American technique, American executive ability, but what to many appears vastly more important, no uncertain part of American buying of raw materials and supplies and of American wage-paying ability. These are losses that never can be recovered.

As yet, as far as I can discover, no responsible person in the administration has seized upon the handle offered by Great Britain. Her invitation to discuss reciprocal tariff pacts should undoubtedly be accepted; the opportunity to increase our trade, at least with Great Britain, should unquestionably be embraced.

In this connection I wish now to read House Concurrent Resolution 11, which I offered under date of January 18, 1932:

That for the purpose of further readjusting the duties on importations into the United States of article or articles the growth, product, or manufacture of the Dominion of Canada, and of the exportation into the Dominion of Canada of article or articles the growth, product, or manufacture of the United States, the President of the United States is authorized and requested to negotiate trade agreements with the Dominion of Canada wherein mutual concessions are made looking toward freer trade relations and the further reciprocal expansion of trade and commerce: Provided, however, That said trade agreements, before becoming operative, shall be submitted to the Congress of the United States for ratification or rejection.

The words of this resolution are identical with the words of a resolution adopted by this very House and sponsored by the late Oscar W. Underwood, a very distinguished Member of this body, who then presided as majority leader. In the passage of this measure he had the whole-hearted support of the people of the United States and of the then President of the United States, Mr. Taft, a firm believer in reciprocity, who exemplified rare statesmanship in crystallizing public opinion in this country in favor of Canadian reciprocity.

At this point I wish to offer a copy of a letter dealing with Canadian-American reciprocity, which I sent to the President under date of October 21, 1931:

OCTOBER 21, 1931.

Hon. HERBERT HOOVER,
President of the United States,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I herewith submit to you certain figures of which you are undoubtedly aware. They indicate the total values of imports and domestic exports of merchandise into and from the United States in its trade with Canada, by monthly periods, from January, 1929, to August, 1931, inclusive.

From these figures it is readily discernible that our trade with Canada has suffered a decided and impressive decline, both as to exports and imports. Whatever can be done to improve this situation should not be left undone. Surely increased trade between ourselves and our neighbors to the north, while it would not wholly solve the economic difficulties under which we now labor, nevertheless would appreciably improve conditions. We have unquestionably come to a parting of the ways. We must determine whether high tariff walls shall isolate us permanently from Canadian markets or whether we shall lower these walls and again become good commercial friends.

Your distinguished predecessor, the late William Howard Taft, in his annual message to Congress of December 6, 1910, and also in his special message of January 26, 1911, voiced sentiments and observations relative to reciprocity with Canada which are just as potent to-day as when they were first uttered. In these messages he called the attention of Congress to the important fact that reciprocal trade agreements had been reached between our Secretary of State and the representatives of the Dominion Government, and that congressional action was now necessary. He also stated that the controversies resulting from the uncertainties which attended the partition of British territory on the American continent at the close of the Revolution had been eliminated by arbitration or by contract negotiations. These disputes related to the settlement of boundaries, the definition of rights of navigation, transportation rights on both sides of the border, Atlantic fishing rights, and the interpretation of treaties. He held that a path was thus opened for the improvement of commercial relations, and that to improve the commercial well-being of the two nations it was essential that Congress should approve reciprocal tariff arrangements.

Unfortunately the farseeing efforts of President Taft proved unavailing, and the trade and commercial breach between Canada and the United States has widened ever since. We have built our tariff walls higher and higher, and the Canadians have responded in kind. Thus, we stand behind our high tariff walls with folded arms while Canada stands behind hers and thumbs her nose at us. Meanwhile business comes to a standstill.

Surely, Mr. President, the identity of interests of the American and Canadian markets, linked together as these nations are by race, language, political institutions, close blood relationships, and common sympathies, as well as geographical proximity, requires a reconsideration of this question of Canadian reciprocity! The rigors of the dreadful depression which has settled alike upon Canada and the United States would certainly be somewhat assauged by freer commercial intercourse. Canada touches our borders for 3,000 miles; her natural resources are similar to ours; the conditions of her wage earners are like ours; her farmers suffer as our farmers suffer. There have never been two countries so alike. The difference between the United States and Canada is only the difference that exists between any two of our States. Lowering the tariff barriers between the two countries, as President Taft so ably stated, "is not a violation of the protective principle, as that has been authoritatively announced by those who uphold it, because that principle does not call for a tariff between this country and one whose conditions as to population, production, and wages are so like ours, and when a common boundary line of 3,000 miles must in itself make a radical distinction between our commercial treatment of Canada and of any other country."

May I not, therefore, Mr. President, prevail upon you to open negotiations to the end that there may be adopted between this country and Canada a sort of zollverein or customs union, so that the reciprocity agitated for so long a period may become finally a reality.

Our citizens are well aware that you are patiently and painstakingly endeavoring to relieve the country of its economic suffering. I personally applaud your desire to have the banks of the nation pool their interests so that the weaker financial institutions may continue to function. I cherish the hope also that the ideal of Canadian reciprocity may likewise be embraced by you and find a place in your program of constructive relief.

Respectfully yours,

EMANUEL CELLER,
Representative Tenth New York District.

No action was, however, taken upon my letter. But in an endeavor to follow it up I addressed another letter to the Premier of Canada, R. B. Bennett, under date of November 5, 1931, dealing with the same subject:

NOVEMBER 5, 1931.

The Hon. R. B. BENNETT,
Premier of the Dominion of Canada,
Ottawa, Canada.

MY DEAR MR. BENNETT: In my capacity as a citizen of the United States, rather than as a Member of the House of Representatives of the United States, I desire to acquaint you with the growing sentiment in the United States for a rapprochement between this country and the Dominion of Canada to the end that there may be readopted what is commonly known as Canadian reciprocity.

As you know, to create closer commercial relations between the two countries a reciprocity treaty was negotiated way back in 1854, and was in actual successful operation from 1855 to March 16, 1866, 11 years. Under that treaty, Canada became second only to Great Britain in foreign trade with the United States. This reciprocal arrangement largely contributed to the very considerable growth of trade in both countries.

Unfortunately, differences arose as a result of our Civil War. In 1864 the American Congress demanded abrogation of the treaty. Two years later, as such period of notice was required under the treaty, the arrangement came to an end.

In 1911, President Taft, despite opposition, was enabled, with the help of a Democratic Congress, to again pass a law providing for reciprocity with Canada. The Canadian Parliament, however, withheld ratification of the treaty embodying the bill. Your distinguished predecessor, Sir Wilfred Laurier, went down to defeat on that issue.

Much water has gone over the dam since then, and I believe that trade relations between the United States and Canada have reached a critical stage. We face two alternatives: Either higher tariffs and less trade, or lower tariffs, by reciprocity or otherwise, and more trade.

There are many in this country who deplored the passage of the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill. They deplored the irritation that it was bound to cause the inhabitants of your fine country. They realized, furthermore, that the high tariff provided for in that bill was bound to cause retaliation. They knew that your people would not offer passive resistance, but, on the contrary, would offer active resistance to this tariff. As extremely important buyers of our American products, you are in a position of strength to bargain for better terms elsewhere if you can not get them from us. Conversely the same holds true for us. You buy from us in large quantities autos, gasoline, farm implements and machinery, cotton, tobacco, iron and steel products, radios, musical instruments, and all kinds of fruit and vegetables. America needs your forest products—nickel, asbestos, zinc, lead, silver, copper, and gold. You need our tourist trade, which yields you over $300,000,000 annually. Reciprocity between the two countries would tremendously increase mutual trade in mutual markets.

Your first reaction against the Hawley-Smoot tariff was the so-called "Dunning Budget," which went into effect May 1, 1930. Mr. C. A. Dunning, Liberal Minister of Finance, put through the most extensive tariff revision in the country, I believe, since 1907. The increases were directly aimed against American goods. As a result of your recent election you, Mr. Bennett, pledged yourself to a revision of tariff upward. On August 26 last your government took action against more American goods. Duties now, for example, on apples, onions, peaches, peas, tomatoes, etc., are wellnigh prohibitive. These increased Canadian duties are bound to have their further repercussions in the United States and may well give rise to further retaliation on our side of the border. Where will it all end?

Canada buys and sells more to the United States than to any other country, and the United States buys and sells more to Canada than to any other country. This trade would admittedly be far greater if there were no tariff barriers or if tariff barriers were reduced. North America is really a complete economic unit: Canada is the northern half, the United States the southern half, with the same language, habits, customs, and culture uniting them. Your radio broadcasts are heard by millions of Americans. Our "talkies" are seen and heard by millions of your people. The same newspapers, magazines, and books freely circulate on both sides of our boundary line. The 3,000 miles of border boasts of no gendarme or soldiering. There never have been two countries so alike. The differences between us are of the same nature as those between any two of our own States. As was pointed out by Alex Skelton in a recent article in The Nation, the following tables show exports of Canadian agricultural products to the United States 10 years ago, when the tariff rates were relatively low, as compared with to-day, when the Hawley-Smoot tariff has reached its pinnacle. You will note the decided loss to your people.

Exports from Canada to United States of principal farm products and United States tariff rates in force for 12 months ended June, 1921, and June, 1931

	Exports value June, 1921	12 months to June, 1931	Tariff rates in force
			1921	1931
Cattle	$21,240,000	$764,000	Free	Under 700 pounds, 2½ cents per pound; over 700 pounds, 3 cents per pound.
Sheep	1,676,000	244	do	$3 per head.
Wheat	101,997,000	6,580,000	do	42 cents per bushel.
Flour	12,687,000	4,310	do	$1.04 per 100 pounds.
Beef	4,485,000	121,000	do	6 cents per pound.
Mutton	1,500,000	191	do	5 cents per pound (lamb, 7 cents per pound).
Butter	2,294,000	20,000	2½ cents per pound.	14 cents per pound.
Cream	2,087,000	1,348,800	Free	56.6 cents per gallon.
Flaxseed	5,045,000	1,088,000	20 cents per bushel.	65 cents per bushel.
Maple sugar	1,122,000	310,000	3 cents per pound.	8 cents per pound (now 4 cents per pound).
Wool	2,227,000	275,000	Free	24 to 37 cents per pound.

Statesmen in both countries must find the conclusion inescapable that the high tariff between the two countries has undoubtedly been detrimental to mutual trade. The official figures for the imports and exports in the first eight months of this current year as compared with the same period of the two preceding years show a very dangerous trend. The figures are as follows:

Jan. 1 to Aug. 31	Exports	Imports
1931	$293,000,000	$184,400,000
1930	480,500,000	289,000,000
1929	659,000,000	335,800,000

The depression can not be said to be responsible for all of this shrinkage. Indeed high tariff barriers have aggravated the depression which has descended upon Canada and the United States alike.

The floodgates of commerce between the two countries therefore should be opened and the waters of prosperity be permitted again to flow to all corners of Canada and the United States. There should be no vying for commercial supremacy by fomenting the trade disputes and rivalries that only retaliatory tariffs bring.

You have been elected upon a platform pledging you to a protective tariff, but lowering the tariff barriers between our countries, as our late President Taft so ably stated, "is not a violation of the protective principle, as that has been authoritatively announced by those who uphold it, because that principle does not call for a tariff between this country and one whose conditions as to population, production, and wages are so like ours, and when a common boundary line of 3,000 miles must, in itself, make a radical distinction between our commercial treatment of Canada and of any other country."

May I, therefore, cherish the hope, as an humble American citizen, that negotiations may be set afoot to the end that Canadian-American reciprocity will soon become fait accompli?

With assurances of highest esteem, I am, sincerely yours,

EMANUEL CELLER.

HOUSE OFFICE BUILDING,
Washington, D. C., United States of America.

At the present time there certainly is an opportunity for President Hoover to do as his predecessor, Mr. Taft, had done—bring about friendly trade relations with Canada and Great Britain. The President can now show of what metal his statesmanship is made.

Some of you may recall that I offered my House Concurrent Resolution 11 as an amendment to the recently passed H. R. 6662. An attempt was made by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. CRISP] to strike it out on a point of order; but he quickly realized his mistake, withdrew his objection, and said that the amendment was quite germane to the bill and should be voted on. This proposed amendment came at the very end of the discussion on the tariff bill, H. R. 6662, close to the end of the day, when the Members were fatigued and anxious to wind up their labors. As a consequence, it was probably lost in the shuffle; sufficient consideration was not given to it, and it failed of passage.

I do, indeed, hope that in the not far-distant future this House Concurrent Resolution 11, having for its purpose the reestablishment of Canadian reciprocity, will find favorable consideration at your hands.

It has been argued that a reciprocal treaty of this character, either with Canada, with Great Britain, or with any other nation, offends the favored-nation clauses of our divers treaties with various other countries. I have grave doubts as to this contention, since in two important decisions—Bartram against Robertson, reported in volume 122 of the United States Reports, at page 116, and Whitney against Robertson, to be found in volume 124 of those reports, page 190, the United States Supreme Court, in effect, has laid down the law that reciprocal trade treaties do not in any respect violate the favored-nation clauses which may be found in most of our commercial treaties.

The headnotes of these two cases I shall now read:

BARTRAM v. ROBERTSON

The provisions in the treaty of friendship, commerce, and navigation with the King of Denmark, concluded April 26, 1826, and revived by the convention of April 11, 1857, do not, by their own operation, authorize the importation, duty free, from Danish dominions, of articles made duty free by the convention of January 30, 1875, with the King of the Hawaiian Islands, but otherwise subject to duty by a law of Congress, the King of Denmark not having allowed to the United States the compensation for the concession which was allowed by the King of the Hawaiian Islands.

WHITNEY v. ROBERTSON

The treaty of February 8, 1867, with the Dominican Republic (art. 9) provides that "no higher or other duty shall be imposed on the importation into the United States of any article the growth, produce, or manufacture of the Dominican Republic, or of her fisheries, than are or shall be payable on the like articles the growth, produce, or manufacture of any foreign country or of its fisheries." The convention of January 30, 1875 with the King of the Hawaiian Islands provides for the importation into the United States, free of duty, of various articles, the produce and manufacture of those islands (among which were sugars) in consideration of certain concessions made by the King of the Hawaiian Islands to the United States. Held, that this provision in the treaty with the Dominican Republic did not authorize the admission into the United States, duty free, of similar sugars, the growth, produce, or manufacture of that Republic, as a consequence of the agreement made with the King of the Hawaiian Islands, and that there was no distinction in principle between this case and Bartram v. Robertson (122 U. S. 116).

Thus, my friends, we must state whether we are to continue or discontinue reciprocal commercial relations with Canada. Must we say that we have come to the parting of the ways, for we are, indeed, well on the road to that point where the ways, so far as Canadian trade is concerned, will, of necessity, part.

The figures which I set forth in my letter to the President indicate such a stupendous loss of exports and imports that we are indeed forced to pause and take heed. We set up a high tariff wall, and with the years that wall has been lifted higher and higher. A retaliatory tariff wall was thus set up by Canada against our products, and with the years that wall, too, has been lifted higher and higher. This so-called trade-protection inevitably breeds contempt; contempt breeds revenge; revenge may breed fear; and fear may breed war. This may sound somewhat far-fetched, but it certainly is within the realm of human possibility.

In any event, it is our duty to take this tariff question by the forelock and not only prevent these walls from going any higher, but, if possible, bring them down to a point where reciprocal relations with Canada will be resumed.

In a lecture recently delivered before the International Relations Study Club at Cornell University, Dr. James E. Boyle, professor of rural economy at that university, speaking on the subject of our trade relations with Canada, said:

Look, for instance, at foreign trade for a moment from Canada's standpoint. Take her 13 best customers in the two years, 1930 and 1931. The notable thing is the decline in the United States share of this trade. The decline is both sudden and violent, amounting as it does to 31 per cent in one year. Stated in the form of a table, the facts are as follows:

Canada's foreign trade with 13 leading customers (12 months ended March, 1930 and 1931)

	1930		1931
	Imports	Exports	Imports	Exports
United States	847	515	584	350
United Kingdom	189	282	149	219
Germany	21	26	16	13
France	25	17	19	13
Japan	12	30	9	19
New Zealand	16	19	7	13
Argentina	10	19	7	10
Belgium	13	22	8	15
Netherlands	9	16	7	10
Australia	4	16	5	7
China	3	16	5	9
British India	9	9	8	7
Italy	5	11	5	14
Canada's total foreign trade, all countries	1,248	1,120	907	800

This table shows that for the period covered there was a slump of 28 per cent in Canada's total foreign trade, and a slump of 31 per cent in her trade with the United States. But since the period covered by these statistics ended in March, 1931, these figures do not show a full year of operation under the prohibitions of the Hawley-Smoot tariff of June, 1930. Statistics now available for the first nine months of 1931—January, 1932—show that the decline in United States trade with Canada is larger than 31 per cent. For this 9-month period—January to September, 1931—the decline in our exports to Canada was 39 per cent; our purchases from Canada, 34 per cent.

The flow of goods back and forth across the border, when not interrupted by artificial barriers such as tariffs, reflects the mutually advantageous investments by individuals of one country in the other, and the equally advantageous individual exchange of goods and services. So it came about naturally that citizens of the United States invested some three and a half billion dollars in Canada, while citizens of Canada invested $1,000,000,000 in the United States. It came about naturally that the merchandise trade between Canada and the United States was greater than that between any other two nations on the face of the globe. In normal times the tourists trade is also a big financial item; it is estimated that our visitors to Canada spend annually some $250,000,000 in that country. Visitors from Canada to the United States are supposed to spend in normal years about $100,000,000.

Unfortunately, in the last two years things have been happening, three things, in fact, which poison the relations between these two countries and which elevate to new and preposterous heights the 3,000 miles of tariff wall now separating them. These three malignant growths are the Hawley-Smoot tariff, the King-Dunning budget, and the Bennett tariff. These three measures are deliberate attempts to kill a large part of the commerce between these two neighbors. The philosophy back of these measures, if carried to its logical extreme, would lead to the following absurd conclusion:

1. It is best to keep your money at home—that is, in your own country.
2. It is best to keep your money in your own State (or province).
3. It is best to keep your money in your own town.
4. It is best to keep your money in your own pocket.
5. It is best to do no buying and selling but to draw your own water, hew your own wood, wash your own linen, and raise your own food.

And so, my friends, I maintain that the time has now arrived when this Congress, in cooperation with the President—if this is possible—should lend its efforts toward the establishing of firmer and improved trade conditions between the United States and Canada. This, we can readily see, will be the beginning of similar trade relations with other nations. England, as has been stated, is now making a bid for our trade—for better, freer, and friendlier trade relations with us. Other nations will follow this course.

I therefore do seriously hope that my words will meet with your favorable consideration. [Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. AYRES].

Mr. AYRES. Mr. Chairman, a tax of 2 and 4 cents per gallon levied upon foreign oil and gasoline imported into this country would not increase the price of such products to the consumer but would produce revenue.

On the first proposition, that it would increase the price of such products to the consumer, it might be well to call attention to the fact that this contention or argument does not by any means hold good in all cases. It can be shown that in many instances a tariff levied on foreign products imported into this country in competition with domestic products of which this country has an ample supply, has not had the effect of increasing the price of the articles produced in this country. I will give below a few illustrations of this fact.

Commodity	Duty or excise tax levied	1929 price before recent tariff law	1931 average price
Potatoes	75 cents per hundredweight	2.27	1.52
Wool	24 cents per pound	32.7	20.5
Oats	16 cents per bushel	48.6	27.8
Cattle hides	10 per cent ad valorem	[1].118	[1].057

[1] Per pound.

And a striking illustration is wheat. We have had for the past year or so a tariff of 42 cents per bushel on wheat. Those of us from wheat States like Kansas know that this 42-cent tariff has not had the effect of increasing the price of wheat produced in Kansas, or, for that matter, anywhere else in the United States, 42 cents a bushel. The real reason, as has often been stated, is because the competition on wheat within the United States and the oversupply have prevented the price from going up in the amount of the tariff. In this connection I call attention to the statement made by Hon. Wirt Franklin, president of the Independent Petroleum Association of America, to the Ways and Means Committee last month. He said:

> As to the price of oil to the consumer (if this tax is put on in the United States) you can well depend upon the competition of the independent branch of the producing and refining industry to take care of the price and hold it down to reasonable levels. If you allow that independent branch to be destroyed, then you do not have any protection for the American consumer whatever.
> If these imported gasolines are a benefit to the consumer, why has not the price on the Atlantic seaboard for gasoline been less than it has been in the interior? They have held the price up to the very limit that it is possible to hold it, and that is well known, and the price has been just a little bit higher on the Atlantic seaboard, where they are buying foreign gasoline, than it has been in the interior.

It is also a well-known fact that notwithstanding the fact a few months ago crude oil was selling as low as 18 and 20 cents a barrel, the price of gasoline remained about the same as when it sold for more than $1 per barrel. And every driver of an automobile knows that the price of lubricating oil was not reduced one cent when the price of crude was reduced from $1.45 to 18 and 20 cents a barrel.

That this tax will produce revenue is shown by the report of the Tariff Commission. Congress created this Tariff Commission with power and authority to investigate, as has been done recently, to ascertain the difference in the cost of production of foreign and domestic petroleum and gasoline. That investigation and report has been made to Congress and shows conclusively that the average cost of production of foreign oil delivered to the Atlantic seaboard of the United States is 87 cents per barrel; that the sale value is $1.90 per barrel. Therefore, it can be seen that if a tax of 2 cents per gallon should be levied, which would amount to 84 cents per barrel, there being 42 gallons to the barrel, it would make the cost $1.71 per barrel. This would still leave a profit of 19 cents per barrel at the present selling price.

This same Tariff Commission report shows that the profit on the domestic crude delivered and refined at the Atlantic seaboard is 11 cents per barrel. Thus it can be seen that by levying a tax of 84 cents per barrel on imported oil we are still giving the foreign competitor of the American independent oil industry the best of it to the extent of 8 cents per barrel profit. To me it seems absurd for anyone who wants to be reasonable and fair to contend that, while the foreign oil importer can undersell the domestic producer at least 8 cents per barrel, that he will not take advantage of that and continue to import as he has heretofore. I can not believe that the Ways and Means Committee, or rather the men who constitute its personnel and who are working day after day searching for something to tax to produce revenue, can be made to believe the claims of those who solely from a selfish viewpoint contend that the proposed tax on foreign imports of oil and gasoline will not produce revenue.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. AYRES. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. In the figures the gentleman has given has he taken into account the difference in the tariff rates in several countries, due to the fact that they have gone off the gold standard?

Mr. AYRES. I have not.

Mr. GOSS. That would make it even greater, would it not?

Mr. AYRES. I should say it would, but I have not considered that question in connection with what I have been discussing.

Mr. GOSS. It would be still farther out of line with those countries that are off the gold standard.

Mr. AYRES. No doubt the gentleman is correct in his statement.

In 1930 there was imported into the United States 62,129,419 barrels of oil of 42 gallons each, or 2,619,435,598 gallons. A 2-cent tax on that oil would have produced revenue of $52,188,711.96. In that same year there was imported 26,080,383 barrels of fuel oil, or 1,095,375,986 gallons. A 2 cents per gallon tax on that oil would have provided a revenue of $21,907,519.72. There was also imported into this country in 1930, 16,926,800 barrels of gasoline or 710,925,600 gallons. A tax of 4 cents per gallon would have provided a revenue of $28,437,024. There was also imported in 1930, 24,782 barrels of lubricating oil or 948,567 gallons. A tax of 4 cents per gallon would have provided revenue of $37,943.04. There are a few more refined products of petroleum imported but I am calling attention to the major items only, which alone would produce a revenue of $102,571,198.72 on the basis of the 1930 importations.

It seems that anyone who wants to be fair would not contend for a moment that a tax as suggested would stop the importation of foreign oil and its refined products, but that there will be just as much imported in the future as has been in the past. And it would seem that this substantial amount of revenue would be advantageous at this particular time.

Even if we should assume that the great oil importers are correct in their utterly undocumented assertion that a tariff or an excise tax would prevent the entrance of foreign oil and therefore not be productive of any revenue from duties, the net result would be the same. The revival of the American petroleum industry would restore lost sources of Federal taxation increasing the receipts from corporation taxes, income taxes, and so forth. At a time when we are seeking for potential sources of revenue we can not afford to ignore the tax-producing possibilities in this restoration of one of our basic industries which formerly paid large sums into the Federal Treasury, but which for the past few years has been the source of practically no revenue or greatly decreased revenue.

The Revenue Department reports show that the Federal Government collected $1,018,911,438 less tax in the fiscal year 1931 than in 1930; and that this decrease is due in the main to a falling off of income taxes, which in amount was $964,932,926.81. In my own State of Kansas there was more than $6,000,000 less income taxes paid last year than in 1927. This is due almost wholly to the fact that the oil producers of that State who have heretofore been heavy contributors to the Federal Government by the payment of income taxes, pay nothing now. What I have said regarding Kansas is true even in a more pronounced degree in other States in the mid-continent oil fields.

The friends of the oil producers of this country have shown the Ways and Means Committee, the members of which committee are striving to the breaking point to balance the Budget, by undisputed evidence a source of revenue of anywhere from $90,000,000 to $100,000,000 without injury to any industry of the United States, and which would at the same time save from utter destruction the third greatest industry of the Nation. This is far better than to put another tax on gasoline, already overtaxed in many instances by many States and cities; or by putting a tax on every check and theater ticket and many other small revenue-producing nuisance taxes.

No one can claim that the American petroleum industry is asking for an unfair advantage over even its foreign competitors. It is asking less than it should be entitled to receive. It is conceding to its business rivals nearly double the amount of profit which is possible for the American industry to receive, as shown by the recent report of the Tariff Commission.

In spite of this handicap, which the American petroleum industry appears to be very willing to accept, there is every certainty that with even this degree of protection, confidence would be restored in our great oil-producing States, with the employment of hundreds of thousands of men, resulting in the renewed purchasing power of the residents in these States west of the Mississippi, and the consequent effect upon the demand for products from our industrial sections, the increased freight shipments, the reemployment of large numbers of men who are either the recipients of public charity or are approaching the time when they must be candidates for alms, unless some such step as this is taken for the revival of American prosperity. Then why not provide this revenue and at the same time give this protection to an American industry? [Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield now to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. MANSFIELD].

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Chairman, a well-organized movement seems to be on foot to bring about a radical change in administration and method of procedure in the improvement of our ports and other navigable waters. For more than 100 years this work has been carried on by the Corps of Engineers of the Army. It is now proposed to create a new department or Government agency of some kind to have supervision over it.

Congress should consider the matter very carefully before taking such a step. It is thought by many that we now have more governmental departments and bureaus than is consistent with the public good. Every agency of this kind, with its salaried officials and army of employees, only adds to the cost of government, already enormous and fast approaching the point of saturation.

Instead of creating additional and expensive governmental agencies, we should be exerting ourselves in an effort to dispense, if possible, with some of those we already have. Certainly no additional bureaus or commissions should be established at this time except possibly such as may be absolutely necessary in the program of relief from financial distress. Agencies for that purpose should be temporary only and should be abolished upon the return of normal conditions.

Aside from adding to the evils of bureaucracy by setting up a new and additional governmental department or commission, it is also a reasonable certainty that such an agency would also prove far less efficient than the system we now have.

A similar proposition was attempted in the construction of the Panama Canal. After Shonts, Wallace, and Stevens, all men of superior qualifications, had given up the job in disgust, Goethals, the Army engineer, was placed in charge. President Roosevelt soon found it necessary to issue an order to protect him from interference by the commission. The result is well known. The work was pushed to completion systematically in less time and at less cost than estimated.

The Board of Engineers, as we now have it, was created by the act of Congress of June 13, 1902. Its principal promoter and author was the late Theodore E. Burton, doubtless our foremost waterway authority. The efficiency of this service has been a monument to Mr. Burton. Prior to the creation of this board there was not sufficient uniformity in waterway improvements. Congress acted upon the report of the district engineer, which was usually transmitted by the Chief of Engineers, but without comment or recommendation. One district engineer might recommend a project, while another district engineer from another section might disapprove a project having more merit than the one recommended. There was no central board or authority to secure uniformity. That object has been accomplished through the board in that it is required to review all proposed improvements.

During the three decades of its operation our ports and inland waters are fast being brought to a standard of perfection unequaled in any other country in the world. Waterway improvements have been divorced from partisan politics and each project is considered scientifically upon its merits. Such measures are no longer referred to as the "pork barrel," but have been placed upon a higher plane, where they have the confidence and approval of the American people.

I include the following from the report on the river and harbor appropriation bill of March 10, 1902, by Theodore E. Burton, chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors at that time:

Section 3 provides for the organization, in the office of the Chief of Engineers, of a board of five Engineer officers, whose duty it shall be to examine the reports upon examinations and surveys ordered by Congress, and submit recommendations thereon. Also to examine, either of their own accord or upon request transmitted to the Chief of Engineers by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House of Representatives, or the Committee on Commerce of the Senate, projects heretofore adopted. The object sought by the creation of this board is to secure greater uniformity in the recommendations and reports relating to various projects in the country, and the examination of existing projects the further prosecution of which is considered questionable.

As already stated, the total estimated cost of river and harbor improvements for which estimates have heretofore been made exceeds $300,000,000. It is evident that the prosecution of many of these improvements must be postponed for a long time or they must be rejected altogether. Under the present system, local engineers make recommendations as to improvements. Some of their reports—namely, those made by officers of a rank lower than that of lieutenant colonel—are submitted to a division engineer, who transmits them to the Chief of Engineers; others are transmitted directly. These engineers are located in different portions of the country, and each acts in making recommendations according to his own standard of the merits of the projects. An examination of their reports shows a marked absence of uniformity. It is thought that the organization of the board provided for will secure greater fairness to all localities and tend to exclude from consideration unworthy projects.

The following is an extract from the speech delivered by Mr. Burton on March 17, 1902, with reference to the above section:

Section 3 provides for a board of engineers, five in number, who shall review all projects examined by the local engineers. This subject was considered at considerable length during the discussions upon the bill last winter. The recommendations upon which items are included in this bill come now directly from those having the rank of lieutenant colonel, or a higher rank, to the Chief of Engineers. Those having a lower rank than that of lieutenant colonel transmit them to the division engineer, who then transmits them to the Chief of Engineers, with his approval or disapproval, then the Secretary of War transmits them to Congress.

The result is just what naturally would be expected. Each engineer has his own standard of the desirability of the work upon which he is called to report, and there comes to Congress and the committee a variety of opinions. It often occurs that an improvement of a certain quality, which will cost, say, $100,000, is recommended. Another report comes from another engineer more conservative in his disposition upon an improvement costing $25,000, which in fact is more beneficial, and yet he gives an adverse report upon it.

It is true that to an extent we can decide upon these reports and recognize the different standards adopted; but it is very desirable that a uniform standard should be adopted by the executive department, and that a board of engineers, five in number, familiar with all the works in the country, should review them before they are sent to Congress. There is also a provision in this section to the effect that the Committee on Commerce of the Senate and the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House can call upon this board for a report upon any project already adopted. Occasionally there is a project upon which we are very doubtful and it seems desirable to have an expert opinion upon it.

Following is an editorial from the Duluth (Minn.) Herald of January 22, 1932:

[From the Duluth (Minn.) Herald, January 22, 1932]

KEEP THE ARMY ENGINEERS ON THE JOB

There is a bill before Congress taking river and harbor work out of the control of the Army Engineer Corps and putting it under the newly created Federal Board of Public Works.

* * * * * * *

But there is something in this situation that is stronger than mere logic, and that is the way the Army engineers have handled this work. In all the long history of river and harbor work under the flower of United States Army which is assembled in the Army Engineer Corps with its high standards, its noble traditions, and its freedom from politics, there is not, so far as we know, even the faintest suspicion of the graft and disorder and waste that all too commonly are associated with civilian handling of public works.

Indeed, if all public operations were handled as well as those for which the Army engineers are responsible, the case against Government ownership and operation would be nowhere near so strong as it is now.

In the face of this splendid record, it would be a grave mistake to remove this very important work from the Army and to turn it over to any political agency.

Mr. FIESINGER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANSFIELD. Yes.

Mr. FIESINGER. Would the gentleman be willing to add this to his speech? It is a statement in a letter from Mr. Malia, secretary of the Great Lakes Harbors Association:

This public works administrator can, if he desires, call on the engineers for terms not exceeding two years. The result of the transfer of all this work to civilians would subject it to political pressure and control.

Now, while the corps may have worn a high hat in the past, and even if they have said "no" to me several times, they have always convinced me of their complete fairness, and I am certain that their system is correct. Any move to change it will result in a fight from me. As I see it, lake cities will stand to take an awful trimming if this work ever gets into the political field. We are bad enough off now, but the new plan would be ruinous.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I am glad to have that included in my remarks.

Waterway legislation now has more safeguards thrown around it than any other class of legislation with which Congress has to deal. I shall not attempt to describe the course of procedure that prevails. For that purpose I yield to one who certainly had no superior as a legislative authority. It was most appropriately described by the late James R. Mann in a speech in the House on January 22, 1917, as follows:

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I shall not vote for this river and harbor bill, although that decision is entirely apart from the merits of the bill. I shall not vote for it because I think that we could do without an annual river and harbor bill in the present state of the Treasury. I shall take the time, however, to make a very slight statement, which I may not have time to complete, with reference to the formation of a river and harbor bill. There have been a great many suggestions made at different times. Whatever men may think about the merits of particular propositions in a bill, there is no legislation which comes before Congress which is so critically scanned by experts as are the river and harbor bills before they reach the House. In the first place, the War Department itself can not institute any recommendation upon its own motion. It is the only branch of the Government that is not permitted to do so. The Executive can not order the War Department to make a report or an estimate or a recommendation to Congress in reference to a river and harbor improvement. You can not reach the War Department through political influence exercised upon the President or the Secretary of War. A provision in the river and harbor bill begins with an item for a survey, and under the law the engineers can not make a survey until as experts they have made an examination as to the probable economy of the improvement, the use that will be made of it, and the benefit that it will be to the shipping industry and to the public.

The Board of Engineers of the United States Army are selected men from West Point who hold their office for life or for good behavior if they do their work. They are the least subject to political influence of anybody in the United States by reason of their position. They can not go to the political activities which exist in the War Department with reference to promotions, because all of their promotions are automatic except as to the Chief of Engineers. When we determine by reason of the activity of a Member of Congress representing his constituents to ask that board to make an examination, they have to first determine whether it will be a profitable adventure if entered upon, and then they are permitted to make an estimate of the cost and present the project to the House. The House itself can not order them to do this. It could at one time by a resolution. The Senate itself can not order them to do this. It is the only case in the Government service where the House can not by resolution ask Government officers to render a service, or where the Senate can not by a resolution ask Government officers to render a service. After they make their estimate, made by the local engineer aided by a civilian engineer working under him, also permanently employed, they have to go through the form—in many ceases it is a form, though in some cases it is the real thing—of having the report pass through the district engineer and the engineer of the enlarged district, whose title I do not now remember. Then the matter goes before the Board of Engineers. Then it comes before the Chief of Engineers. Then it comes before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. There are more processes involved and far more expert men, wholly disinterested, unbiased, uncontrolled by politics in reference to a river and harbor item than any other legislation provided by any legislative assembly in the world.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. SPARKMAN. I yield three minutes more to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Chairman, the river and harbor bill comes to the House. We call it a pork-barrel bill. It is in the sense that term is used. It comes to the House as an omnibus bill, with the items bunched together. If we had a thousand hours in the day and a thousand days in the year and could sit here all the time, possibly, but not probably, we might consider those items by themselves. It is never practicable to pass river and harbor items as separate bills, and with some experience in the House I venture to say that if the river and harbor items were introduced as separate bills by Members from their various districts, with those Members pulling and hauling, with the personal influence upon the committee, there would be more bad projects reported by that system than are reported now, because the committee then would say: "Oh, the items come up by themselves; the responsibility is not upon us; the responsibility is upon the House." It is an easy question to cite the Claims Committee of the House, a good committee, which has done excellent work, but which reports more bad bills through personal solicitation than all the other committees of the House combined, because they are separate bills. Pulling and hauling is what gets it. If we should make a lump-sum appropriation to the War Department, it would not benefit things at all, because half the scanning will be taken away. We do not provide for river and harbor bills until they have passed the War Department. Then they have to pass the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, they have to pass the House and Senate, though I do not know that that is very much under the circumstances, and the giving of a lump sum would only make it worse. But to let the Secretary of the Interior, the Secretary of Agriculture, the Secretary of War, and one other Secretary, as provided in this bill, select some chief clerk there or some high-priced clerk, wholly subject to political influence, wholly under the control of a superior officer, holding a tenure of office at the will of the man above him, without training, without expertness, for them to pass upon the methods now in existence of determining these things by the War Department would be to ask an ignorant man to judge of the literary ability of a distinguished scholar. What is the use?

[Applause.]

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM].

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Chairman, I regard it as my public duty not only to this House but to the country to review at this time the facts in the criminal case of the notorious Bishop James Cannon, jr.

Found guilty by the unanimous findings of a Senate investigating committee of violation of the Federal corrupt practices act in the presidential campaign of 1928, as I had charged, and indicted by a Federal grand jury last October, Bishop Cannon, according to the press, apparently will escape confinement at the Federal penitentiary at Atlanta by employing the same methods invoked by notorious gunmen and professional criminals, namely, by making a technical objection to the criminal indictment. The sum total of his objection to the indictment, which was sustained by the court, was that it did not allege as a fact that Miss Burroughs, treasurer of the political committee of which Bishop Cannon was chairman, a former secretary and employee of the bishop, knew that Bishop Cannon had received from E. C. Jameson the funds which were not reported under the Federal corrupt practices act. It is unusual even for gunmen and professional criminals to seek shelter behind a woman.

Bishop Cannon has repeatedly stated that he desired a judicial, not a political, determination of this issue; yet when a judicial determination could have been obtained, he made it impossible by evasion and technical objection.

Bishop Cannon did not dare to submit himself to cross-examination under oath before a jury in relation to the handling of the funds which he received for political purposes during the 1928 presidential campaign.

In November of 1929 I called to the attention of the so-called lobby investigating committee of the Senate headed by the late Senator Caraway the violation of the traditional American principle of the separation of church and state by certain ecclesiastical organizations through political dictation to the executive, legislative, and judicial branches of the Government. Accepting an invitation to appear before the committee, I made charges against the Board of Temperance, Prohibition, and Public Morals of the Methodist Episcopal Church, the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, and the Commission on Prohibition and Social Service of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, of which Bishop Cannon was and is chairman.

During my testimony in relation to the Commission on Prohibition and Social Service and Bishop Cannon I brought to the attention of the committee that in the 1928 presidential campaign Bishop Cannon had organized and had been chairman of a partisan political committee known as the Anti-Smith Democrats, operating in two or more States and therefore subject to the provisions of the Federal corrupt practices act, that this committee had reported to the Clerk of the House of Representatives the receipt from E. C. Jameson of only $17,000, and this report was not made in conformity with the requirements of the Federal corrupt practices act, whereas E. C. Jameson had reported to the Senate special committee investigating presidential campaign expenditures appointed in 1928 that he had given Bishop Cannon $65,300 for the political purposes of the Anti-Smith Democrats.

When I first made my general charges against the ecclesiastical organizations, Bishop Cannon insisted that he be given an opportunity to testify if any of my charges involved him or his organization. Subsequently, early in June of 1930, he did appear before the committee voluntarily, but, once under oath and subject to cross-examination, he refused to answer any questions concerning the contributions received from E. C. Jameson and the failure to report or account for $48,300 of the $65,300 received, and he left the committee room.

In the meantime Mr. Jameson, summoned before the so-called lobby investigating committee, had testified to that committee also that he had given Bishop Cannon $65,300; that this amount was issued in a series of checks, most of which were made payable to "bearer" or to "cash," and which were so drawn, according to Mr. Jameson, at the request of Bishop Cannon. The canceled checks were before the committee.

Bishop Cannon did not dare to submit himself to cross-examination under oath before a senatorial committee in relation to the handling of the funds which he received for political purposes during the 1928 presidential campaign.

On June 17, 1930, after Bishop Cannon's refusal to testify before the Senate so-called lobby investigating committee, I addressed this House, and in detail and categorically, from evidence presented to the committee, I charged Bishop James Cannon, jr., with being a shameless violator of the Federal corrupt practices act in words which Bishop Cannon himself, in his declaration in his libel suit filed against me a year later, interprets as indicating that he had diverted to his own private use the whole or part of the unaccounted contributions received from E. C. Jameson.

Immediately thereupon Bishop Cannon publicly challenged me to make my charges off the floor of the House, divested of my congressional immunity, declaring that otherwise I should prove myself a "blustering, cowardly Congressman."

Summarizing my address to the House and divesting myself of my congressional immunity, on June 21, 1930, I publicly charged Bishop Cannon of being a shameless violator of the Federal corrupt practices act.

On November 15, 1930, I transmitted to the Attorney General of the United States a brief of the facts in the case as brought out by the so-called lobby investigating committee, and I formally and officially demanded that the evidence of the violation of the Federal corrupt practices act by Bishop Cannon be placed before a Federal grand jury. The Department of Justice took no action.

Early in 1931 the Select Committee on Senatorial Campaign Expenditures of the Senate, commonly known as the Nye committee, had its authority extended to investigate the charges against Bishop Cannon.

Bishop Cannon at once challenged the jurisdiction of the committee, and in the midst of the committee's investigations he filed suit in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia petitioning for a writ of prohibition to prevent the committee from taking further testimony or examining any of the books and papers which had been previously produced in response to lawfully issued subpœnas, and asking further that the testimony already existing, both in written and printed form, be destroyed. The petition was promptly denied by the court.

Again Bishop Cannon did not dare to submit himself to cross-examination under oath before a senatorial committee in relation to the handling of the funds which he received for political purposes during the 1928 presidential campaign.

Notwithstanding the refusal of Bishop Cannon and of other witnesses whom he controlled to testify, the Nye committee unanimously found—

First. That there were "numerous apparent violations of the Federal corrupt practices act, and many unexplained discrepancies between the bank accounts in which political funds were deposited and the reports rendered on behalf of the headquarters committee to the Clerk of the House."

Second. That whereas Miss Ada L. Burroughs, a former employee of Bishop Cannon, was the nominal treasurer of the headquarters committee, anti-Smith Democrats, the funds of that organization were in fact largely handled by the chairman, Bishop James Cannon, jr.

Third. That Bishop Cannon utilized 10 bank accounts to handle the funds of this committee, all of which, with the exception of one, were subject to check or withdrawal by James Cannon, jr., alone, and only one of which was in the name of the anti-Smith Democrats.

Fourth. That there were intricate and inexplicable transfers of money among these accounts which included personal accounts of Bishop Cannon and that frequent entries were also made by Bishop Cannon to a safe-deposit box which Bishop Cannon had in a Richmond bank.

Fifth. That a large amount of money was sent to a certain bank for the account of a company which had been defunct for seven years.

Sixth. That the committee received in excess of $130,000 during the campaign, although only $58,558.62 was accounted for in statements filed with the Clerk of the House of Representatives under the Federal corrupt practices act.

Many other irregular and suspicious transactions were reported by the Nye committee.

This record upon its face makes it clear why Bishop Cannon did not dare to face the two senatorial committees and the Federal jury to be cross-examined under oath in relation to the disposition of the funds which he had received as chairman of the anti-Smith Democrats.

According to the press, Bishop Cannon has stated that upon the disposition of the appeal from the dismissal of his indictment in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, he will "present important facts giving such details as may be necessary to explain satisfactorily to every fair-minded person the many misleading statements which have been made before committees and which have appeared in the press" regarding his acts in the campaign against Alfred E. Smith in 1928. Unless Bishop Cannon's statements are made under oath when he is subject to cross-examination, they will be utterly worthless and will merely be a travesty upon the truth.

There is still a way, however, for this House and the country to learn the real and damning facts in this case. On June 3, 1931, almost a whole year after my charges were made public, Bishop Cannon, as I have stated, filed suit against me for libel, for $500,000 in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. In his declaration for damages he made it a question for a jury whether he had honestly administered the funds received from E. C. Jameson during the 1928 presidential campaign.

To his declaration I filed a plea of justification; that is to say, I admitted the publication and stated it was true. I claimed no privilege or immunity which is accorded to Members of Congress by the Constitution of the United States, but I set out in an additional plea that Bishop Cannon, as he himself alleges in his declaration, was during the campaign of 1928 in the position of an active leader and participant in the political campaign, and that he was justly subject at the hands of a Member of Congress, who represents not only his own district but the whole people of the United States, to such criticism, as competent and undisputed evidence already produced before committees of Congress warranted; and I further pleaded that my statement was made at his express invitation and in response to a challenge by him that charged me with being a blustering, cowardly Congressman.

I have not pleaded and will not claim any constitutional or congressional immunity from the consequences of my statement made about him.

It is apparent, therefore, that the simple issue in this case is the truth of the statement I have made and the determination of the question of his honesty which he raises in his declaration for damages, and I challenge him to meet me in the forum, where that truth shall be determined upon his oath as well as upon mine.

In order completely to expose this spurious, self-designated, moral leader and ecclesiastical, whitened sepulcher, I challenge him to try his libel suit against me, and I hereby call upon him through his counsel to arrange with the counsel representing me for an early trial at this term of court before it adjourns at the end of June, that truth under oath shall be developed not only for the benefit of the jury sitting to try this case, but for the information and enlightenment of that larger jury, the American people.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I yield.

Mr. BLANTON. The press reports that the gentleman's lawyer did claim immunity for the gentleman from Massachusetts, to wit, that under the Constitution the gentleman from Massachusetts, being a Congressman, did not have the right to waive immunity, and that the court sustained that plea, and that but for that plea there would be a trial on the merits. What about that?

Mr. TINKHAM. The statement in the papers was not correct.

Mr. BLANTON. Then there was no such claim made by the gentleman's attorney, that the gentleman, being a Congressman, had no right to waive immunity?

Mr. TINKHAM. Not that I know of. I was not present.

Mr. BLANTON. The press also reports that the gentleman's attorneys claimed that Bishop Cannon having dared the gentleman from Massachusetts to make the statement and to waive immunity, that the gentleman's accepting the dare did not take away from him the constitutional immunity that surrounds a Congressman and protects him.

Mr. TINKHAM. I think that is not good law, nor do I know that my attorney made any such claim. In any event, no such claim will be made by my attorney or by me, and no claim of constitutional immunity was made by me.

Mr. BLANTON. As I understand it, the only thing that stands in the way of a trial on its merits where the gentleman from Massachusetts will be heard under oath, and the bishop's lawyer can cross-examine the gentleman, and where Bishop Cannon will be heard under oath and the gentleman from Massachusetts and his lawyers can cross-examine him, is the fact that there is some law question raised by the gentleman's lawyer which prevents going to trial. Is that not the fact?

Mr. TINKHAM. No; that is not the fact.

Mr. BLANTON. I have understood that if the gentleman's lawyers will withdraw the law question, there will be a trial on its merits. That is what I have been informed.

Mr. TINKHAM. Well, that is not so. My pleadings have been filed in full. No demand was made, so far as I am concerned, for any immunity or congressional privilege, nor will my attorney make such claim, nor do I nor will I.

Mr. BLANTON. Then the gentleman has not won out on this damage suit, as the press reports?

Mr. TINKHAM. That was not correct either.

Mr. BLANTON. There has been no court ruling on the question at all in the gentleman's favor?

Mr. TINKHAM. Well, I think there has been some ruling.

Mr. BLANTON. What ruling was that? We would like to know about it.

Mr. TINKHAM. Well, I do not have the pleadings before me.

Mr. BLANTON. But what kind of a law question did the gentleman's lawyer raise that the court sustained him on?

Mr. TINKHAM. Bishop Cannon's attorney made a plea to strike out two or three parts of the answer.

Mr. BLANTON. As being scandalous?

Mr. TINKHAM. Not as being scandalous, but as not being in conformity with the practice in this district.

Mr. BLANTON. I am sure that the honorable court must have been wrong about that, because the gentleman from Massachusetts is such a distinguished lawyer and he has shown such ability before our Appropriations Committee in examining the Attorney General of the United States for about three and a half days that I know he would not put anything in his answer that was not proper and not in accordance with the procedure.

Mr. TINKHAM. I do not have the pleadings before me, and, of course, pleadings are somewhat complex. Each district or each State has its own rules as to pleadings.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman will understand I hold no brief for Bishop Cannon.

Mr. TINKHAM. I understand that.

Mr. BLANTON. I am just interested in knowing what the real facts are that keep the gentleman and Bishop Cannon from going to bat. I want to go down there and hear his lawyer cross-examine the gentleman and I want to hear the gentleman cross-examine Bishop Cannon.

Mr. TINKHAM. I think I have made a clear statement that I desire to have a trial as soon as possible and that I have waived all congressional immunity in relation to the trial.

Mr. BLANTON. I heard one of the Bishop's friends say the other day that if the gentleman's lawyer will get the law cobwebs out of the way both of you will have a chance to testify on the witness stand.

Mr. TINKHAM. Well, the gentleman must not listen with a too-believing ear to everything he hears. [Applause and laughter.]

Mr. GUYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I yield.

Mr. GUYER. Have the courts not decided that there was no violation of any Federal statute because electors are State officers and not national officers?

Mr. TINKHAM. That has not been decided by the court.

Mr. GUYER. It has not been finally decided, perhaps.

Mr. TINKHAM. It has not been decided finally.

Mr. GUYER. But as far as the court has gone it has, has it not?

Mr. TINKHAM. No; it has not. To the criminal indictment against him Bishop Cannon filed a demurrer and in the demurrer he raised the question of the constitutionality of the corrupt practices act, but the judge made no decision upon that, deciding only the point in the demurrer of which I have spoken in my statement.

Mr. GUYER. I understood the newspaper reports to be that the court decided that electors were State officers and not national officers, and therefore there was no violation of the corrupt practices act.

Mr. TINKHAM. As I stated before, the court made no ruling upon that. The decision of the court was on an entirely different question.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time. [Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LOZIER].

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, I want to finish my remarks within the 20 minutes allotted me, and as I desire to make a connected statement, until I have finished what I have in mind to say, I will not yield to any of my colleagues; but after I have completed my statement I will be glad to answer any question that may be propounded.

For 35 years, continuously since March 4, 1897, the executive branch of our Government has been under the control of the Republican Party, with the exception of the Woodrow Wilson administration of eight years from March 4, 1913, to March 4, 1921. Since the last-mentioned date, the Republican Party has been in control of both the executive and legislative departments. During that long lease of power the Republican Party has worked its will and enacted legislation embodying its selfish and sordid political philosophy. It has placed on the statute books laws in harmony with its political theories. It has claimed that those laws would insure national tranquillity, economic stability, and universal prosperity.

It has argued that of the two great political parties in America, it alone had mastered the science of statecraft and was capable of piloting the ship of state. It alone could formulate and execute wise public policies. It alone could efficiently administer our domestic and international affairs. It alone could keep the tide of commerce flowing. It alone could keep the machinery in our mills and factories moving. It alone could wisely direct our great transportation systems, manage our exceedingly complicated financial affairs, stabilize business, prevent unemployment, and furnish the American workman with a full dinner pail.

It has argued that it alone could stimulate productive industry, inspire confidence, maintain a high-wage scale, and guaranty to the American farmer a price for his commodities which would insure a handsome profit over and above the cost of production. In short, the high priests of Republicanism, without a modicum of modesty and claiming plenary inspiration, have boldly asserted and plausibly maintained that they were the Lord's annointed, and the instrument by which a divine providence would open the doors of heaven and pour out a flood of prosperity so great that our banks, trust companies, safe-deposit vaults, and storehouses would overflow with our ever-increasing golden treasures.

They inoculated the voters with the baseless belief that the Republican Party had a monopoly upon political wisdom; that the Democratic Party was inept, destitute of constructive ability, and a leaderless mob of hair-brained, wild-eyed incompetents. All this they claimed and much more.

If the heavens sent refreshing showers and auspicious seasons to ripen bumper crops, the spokesmen of the G. O. P. in stentorian tones shouted, "Look what the Republican Party did for you!" If the gardens, orchards, and vineyards each yielded its fruit in season, Republicans claimed the credit. If our foreign markets, captured and built up under the wise and far-seeing administration of Woodrow Wilson, called more and more for the products of the farms, factories, mills, and mines, Republican orators pointed with pride to our rapidly growing international trade, and forthwith proceeded to enact new tariff laws to unconscionably increase the unearned and undeserved bounty of the beneficiaries of special privilege.

If our banks were no longer sufficiently spacious to hold the $133,000,000,000 of new wealth that accrued to the American people in the eight years of Woodrow Wilson's administration, a "holier than thou" provincial Republican President forthwith issued a pronunciamento crediting the Republican Party with everything of value that had accrued to the Nation, copyrighted the terms "economy" and "prosperity," and used them as a screen behind which to practice reckless extravagance, inaugurated a reckless riot of special privilege, and called on the American voters to smite the Democrats hip and thigh for the alleged reasons that Republicans alone were capable of efficiently administering our national affairs, and that Republicans, like Midas, turn everything they touch into gold.

During the eight years of Democratic administration, from 1913 to 1921, all vocational groups enjoyed the greatest prosperity and increase of national wealth in our history. From 1913 to 1921 the wealth of the American people increased from $187,000,000,000 to $330,000,000,000. It is significant that almost as much new wealth was created and acquired in the eight years of Democratic administration as had been accumulated in the preceding 300 years, a record unsurpassed in this or any other nation in all the tide of time. Think of it; $133,000,000,000 was added to the stock of American national wealth during the eight years of the last Democratic administration, while from the colonial period down to 1913 the American people had only accumulated $187,000,000,000 of national wealth.

Before the Republican medicine makers and Republican prosperity fakers seized the reins of government in 1921, the American people were enjoying genuine and generous prosperity. During the Wilson administration each occupational class received its equitable share of the prosperity and new wealth that flowed like a golden river into the pockets of the American people. Under the last Democratic administration we did not have a sectional, lopsided or jug-handled prosperity, but every section, class, and group, shared in the new wealth which annually accrued to the American people. Budgets were balanced, interest paid, taxes met, and every maturing liability found the debtor with money in bank with which to discharge his obligations. Never before or since did such real and abundant prosperity dominate our economic life.

But what an odious and vulnerable record has been written in the last 11 years by the faithless leaders of the Republican Party. What a miserable mess they have made of their opportunities. [Applause.] What a base betrayal of the people. What an inexcusable sacrifice of national interests and national dignity. What a reign of extravagance, graft, and maladministration. Let us glance at this invidious record, this partisan salmagundi. Here is a general inventory of the Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover administrations:

Eleven years of class legislation, special privilege, governmental favoritism, and servile surrender to tariff lords and big business buccaneers. [Applause.] Eleven years of contemptuous indifference to the just demands of the agricultural classes for economic equality with the other vocational groups. Eleven years of decreasing prestige abroad and rapidly growing disfavor among the nations of the earth. Eleven years of economic riot, prostitution of power, empty promises, unfulfilled pledges. Eleven years of economic injustice that has beggared millions. Eleven years of artificial, unnatural, unreasonable, and unnecessary stimulation of industry, resulting in such grossly abnormal production as to make inevitable the industrial collapse which now threatens the economic life of the Nation.

Eight thousand banks, that under Democratic administration had been prosperous and filled to overflowing, closed their doors under the Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover administrations, beggaring their depositors and stockholders, and precipitating business chaos and nation-wide distress.

Railroads, that under Democratic administration had functioned efficiently, borne the terrific strain of the most destructive war in human history, and carried a volume of commerce that staggers human comprehension, began to sicken and languish under the so-called business administrations of the Republican Party. In many instances their income declined, their rolling stock deteriorated, their roadbeds crumbled, their dividends ceased, the market price of their stocks fell to unprecedented low levels, and receiverships became almost as common as under the Roosevelt and Taft administrations; and the stock market, the special pet of the Republican Party, and which typified its worship of Mammon, crashed like the collision of continents and the wreck of spheres.

Farmers who were never so prosperous as under the last Democratic administration, were, under succeeding Republican administrations, unable to balance their budgets, pay their taxes, and meet maturing interest obligations; and, although they had stirred the soil into generous productivity, Republican high tariff laws and Republican maladministration of our domestic and international affairs provoked other nations to enact retaliatory tariffs, and as a result of these and other shortsighted policies, the markets for farm products were destroyed, and prices fell to the lowest level in history.

Farm lands and farm commodities that under Democratic administration had enriched rural sections and created an independent, self-sustaining, self-respecting agrarian population, became a drug on the market under short-sighted and self-serving Republican policies, and under the clumsy manipulation of the Republican Farm Board. An innumerable host of the American farmers have been swept into bankruptcy, their farms sold on the block at sacrificial prices, dissipating the earnings and accumulations of a lifetime. Under 11 years of Republican rule, what has become of the prosperous, forward-looking, upstanding, hopeful, and self-reliant farmers of America? Millions have been broken on the rock of insolvency. Millions of their fellows have abandoned hope and with aching hearts, crushed spirits, and empty purses, are with their families, marching with unsteady step toward a condition of peasantry comparable with that which prevails in many European states.

Under Republican administration what has become of the small tradesman, the small retail merchant, the small shopkeeper? Echo answers, they are stumbling down the steep path of insolvency to the bottomless pit of financial ruin. Under Republican rule the development of our national resources has been halted. What has happened to the once flourishing irrigation and reclamation districts? Why are large areas of fruitful, reclaimed western lands reverting to desert? Why are the productive, reclaimed swamp and overflowed lands in the Middle West returning to a state of nature and rapidly becoming a wilderness?

Friends, the explanation is found in the fact that the Republican Party, by the selfish and sordid policies of its blind leaders, has impoverished the so-called common people, the wayfaring men and women of the Nation. By burdensome tariffs and other taxes, by extravagance in public expenditures, by special privileges to certain favored groups, by penalizing agriculture for the enrichment of industry, by creating departments, bureaus, and commissions with an army of employees as numerous as the swarms of locusts with which Jehovah afflicted Egypt, the masses of the American people have been bled white, deprived of their substance, and reduced to penury. Under Republican administrations the greatest industrial, financial, and business structures in the world have been undermined and brought dangerously close to destruction.

If the Republican Party has a monopoly on economic and business genius and if it is the master of governmental efficiency, why does unprecedented stagnation clog every avenue of business? Why is insolvency increasing so rapidly? In a period of plenty, why does gaunt famine stalk abroad over the land, touching with his bony fingers millions of underfed and undernourished men, women, and children, who under the last Democratic administration never felt the pangs of hunger or the pinch of penury? [Applause.]

In the greatest industrial nation on earth, why are seven or eight million men idle, walking the streets, seeking employment, begging for bread?

If the Republican Party is the party of prosperity and plenty; if it has a magic wand with which it may touch the slumbering industrial forces of the Nation, quicken them to new life, and create a condition of affluence and contentment; if it is the one and only master of business economics; if it is the divinely anointed and appointed guardian and curator of prosperity, why, in the name of a long-suffering public, does it not function and lift the pall of depression from a sorely afflicted people? If Mr. Hoover and his oligarchy are such miracle-working masters of statecraft, why do these intolerable conditions prevail?

Mr. CAMPBELL of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOZIER. Not now.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I yield to the gentleman five minutes more.

Mr. CAMPBELL of Iowa. Will the gentleman reserve enough time to answer a few questions?

Mr. LOZIER. The gentleman knows that I have declined to yield until I have finished my statement, after which I will yield to him if I have any time remaining.

The plain truth of the matter is that the Republican Party is stewing in its own juice. Its present leaders obtained and are now holding control of our Government by false pretences and false promises. Their ruthless exercise of embezzled power has impoverished the Nation. The Republican leaders have used the agencies and instrumentalities of the Government in such a prodigal and reckless manner as to nearly destroy our economic, industrial, agricultural, and business structures. Instead of the present leaders of the Republican Party being miracle-working masters of statecraft, experience has demonstrated that they are richly caparisoned economic mountebanks, blowing partisan tin whistles, granting special privileges, making false prophesies, exploiting the masses, and industriously carrying on the ancient and none too honorable game of fooling the people.

Please do not misunderstand me; I acquit the rank and file of the Republican Party of responsibility for the shortsighted and pernicious policies and egregious blunders of the Republican leaders. The individual Republicans are not to blame for the colossal failures of the men who are now in control of the Republican Party. These self-constituted leaders have ignored the wishes and been indifferent to the welfare of both Republicans and Democrats.

The Republican Party has been in control and made the laws which it claimed would usher in an economic millennium, but which have brought the American people to the brink of disaster. After aggravating economic and industrial forces that create unemployment, the Republican Party has done nothing to remedy our present unhappy economic conditions. By the reckless enactment of special privilege legislation, the Republican Party has reduced the masses of the American people to a tragic state of economic vassalage. It has babied, petted, and toadied big business at the expense of the unorganized millions.

In a spirit of unbridled arrogance, the present faithless leaders of the Republican Party have oppressed the American people with a man-destroying, hope-wrecking, heart-breaking, poverty-producing administration of our public affairs. They have ravished our national interests, flouted social justice, been indifferent to our national welfare, and in supreme wantonness of power have wrecked or grievously burdened practically every home in America.

To paraphrase the language of Don Quixote, "in voting the Republican Party into power the American people went out for wool, and came home shorn themselves." Instead of a song of joy, the Republican Party has given us only grief and pain as a perpetual reminder of the ignoble failure of the present occupant of the White House and his party associates. Generous in promises but scant in fulfillment, 11 years of Republican administration have produced only a harvest of barren regrets, "like Dead Sea fruit that tempt the eye but turn to ashes on the lips."

As half-starved spiders prey on half-starved flies, so under the administration of the great engineer, half-insolvent bankers prey on half-bankrupt bankers. What a grotesque image Uncle Sam presents when he sees himself in the warped mirror of Hoover prosperity.

What Heraclitus would not laugh at or what Democritus would not weep over the political and social condition to which Republican maladministration of our national affairs has brought the American people? Under the stupid manipulation of the Farm Board, sharp misery has worn the American farmer to the bones, and practically every allied industry to destruction. Under the administration of the miracle-working engineer in the White House industrial chaos, commercial stagnation, transportation inertia, agricultural disaster, and business calamity now sit in the seat of the mighty and hold high carnival, while a great Nation stands helpless and sees its matchless economic structure wrecked.

Try as it may, the Republican Party can not evade responsibility for present deplorable economic conditions. During its long control of our Government, it has legislated for the classes, discriminated against the masses, exploited and unduly burdened the common people, made a football of agriculture, cluttered our statutes with class legislation, taxed the many for the enrichment of the few, and supinely turned over our executive and legislative departments to certain favored groups, and allowed them to exploit the people and use the agencies and instrumentalities of the Government to accomplish their selfish, sordid, and sinister purposes.

The policies of the Republican Party have brought our Nation dangerously close to an economic abyss.

The great trouble is that by a system of class legislation, the Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover administrations have unjustly distributed the burdens and benefits of government, and have destroyed the buying power of the common people.

Until and unless the buying power of the people is restored, until the farmer can sell his commodities at prices that will not only return the cost of production, but afford a substantial profit, until there is a radical narrowing of the spread between what the farmer pays for his supplies and what he gets for his commodities, all the legislation you enact will be disappointing and ineffective. Before there can be any worthwhile economic rehabilitation you must restore the buying power of the common people. [Applause.]

If you start your mills and factories to-morrow morning it would be a question of only a few days or weeks until you would be compelled to shut them down for you could not find a market for the products of those mills and factories, because the people have only a limited, and in most cases no, purchasing power.

All the legislation this Congress enacts, all the legislation any Congress can enact, will be palliative only and will not result in a rehabilitation of industrial and commercial activities unless some way is devised to restore the buying power of the so-called common people and middle classes.

There are in the United States 30,000,000 people who either directly or indirectly depend upon agriculture for a livelihood. The policies of the Republicans for the last 11 years have driven these 30,000,000 people dangerously close to penury, peasantry, and pauperism.

Until you can restore the buying power of those 30,000,000 people, until all vocational groups are placed on the basis of economic equality, until we abandon the present much-overworked system of privilege and class legislation, there can be no rehabilitation of any of our great vocational groups. [Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield now to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. SWANK].

Mr. SWANK. Mr. Chairman, the World War was officially ended by resolution of Congress July 2, 1921, although the armistice was signed November 11, 1918. Since the war was ended there has been much agitation—and rightfully so—for legislation to take the profits out of war, for the American people do not want another war. The horribleness of the World War is still fresh in the memory of the American people, and especially of the mothers who reared the boys that did the fighting. All Americans are ready and willing to fight in the necessary self-defense of their country against all foes, but in such a war we do not want the profiteers with us even when absolutely necessary to fight. We should at all times have an Army and Navy adequate for all purposes of defense in the protection of our people, but that does not mean that we need the greatest Army and Navy in the world. We are far away from other countries and those near us are our friends, and if not, can be made so by proper and just treatment. America—and what American does not thrill at the word—wants none of the possessions of any other country in all the world. We want to live in peace with them. Another war might destroy all living things in the world. Before the great World War no person would have thought, or even imagined, the horrors of that war. No citizen knew of the wicked liquid fire, poisonous gas, and other instruments of death used in that war. No one could have believed that civilized and Christian nations would have resorted to the use of such weapons for the purpose of taking human life. June 27, 1930, a joint resolution by the Senate and House of Representatives was approved creating a commission to consider legislation to take the profits out of war. Following is the resolution:

[PUBLIC RESOLUTION NO. 98, SEVENTY-FIRST CONGRESS]

[H. J. Res. 251]

Joint resolution to promote peace and to equalize the burdens and to minimize the profits of war

Resolved, etc., That a commission is hereby created to study and consider amending the Constitution of the United States to provide that private property may be taken by Congress for public use during war and methods of equalizing the burdens and to remove the profits of war, together with a study of policies to be pursued in event of war. The commission shall report definite recommendations to the President of the United States to be by him transmitted to the Congress not later than the first Monday in December, 1931, together with copies of its proceedings and hearings and to report if, in their opinion, any constitutional amendment be necessary to accomplish the purposes desired: Provided, That said commission shall not consider and shall not report upon the conscription of labor.

SEC. 2. That said commission shall be composed of four Members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, and four Members of the Senate, to be appointed by the President of the Senate, the Secretary of War, Secretary of the Navy, Secretary of Agriculture, Secretary of Commerce, Secretary of Labor, and the Attorney General.

SEC. 3. The said members to be appointed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate shall meet as soon as possible after the enactment of this resolution in the city of Washington, D. C. The Secretary of War shall supply from the War Department all necessary office and clerical assistance.

SEC. 4. When said commission shall meet it shall organize by electing one of its number as chairman, and another as vice chairman, and shall appoint a secretary.

SEC. 5. That no compensation shall be paid any member of said commission, and no expenses shall be incurred by them except the actual expenses of sustenance and travel for the members of the commission, and printing and clerical assistance that can not be reasonably provided by the War Department.

Approved June 27, 1930.

Under that resolution, the commission was to report the different recommendations to the President of the United States, to be by him transmitted to Congress not later than the first Monday in December, 1931. That time has been extended, and we hope when the recommendations are made they will contain proper suggestions and steps to be taken for this necessary legislation. If such a law can be enacted, it will do more to discourage wars in the future than all the peace conferences combined. Congress should give notice now to those who profit by war that there will be no profit if we are ever engulfed in another war. Makers and traders in war material during the last war made unreasonable and outrageous profits, while the boys who did the fighting received the sum of $1 per day. They left their homes and their positions on the farms, in every hamlet, village, and city in this country. They left their families and loved ones, in many instances never to see them again. I favor legislation in conformity with this resolution, but let not Congress and this administration now in power delay longer with this important legislation. Some plan can be devised by this commission in its extensive study of this question.

Mr. Chairman, another good and effective method to take the profits out of war is to take the profits out of the last war. This can be done by providing proper, effective, and adequate allowance and treatment for the veterans of that war and providing compensation for their wives and children when the soldier husband and father has left them. No soldier should be permitted to suffer and neither should his family. Taxes should be increased on the higher incomes and an effective levy should be made on estates, inheritances, and gifts, to help defray these expenses. No person in this country should escape these taxes. The great and powerful corporations made their billions of dollars in the World War, and now let them pay. When they know that Congress means business, they will then realize that there will be no money made out of another war.

The Committee on Pensions has favorably reported a bill to Congress for its consideration granting pensions and allowances to the widows of all war veterans alike. This bill, if enacted into law, as it should be, will grant pensions to these widows at the rate of from $20 per month to $50 per month, and additional allowances for minor children under 16 years of age. Those persons and corporations who made so much money in the last war will oppose these bills, but when these measures come before Congress we will enact them into law. I have always favored such a bill and shall exert every effort to have it passed.

Another bill that these same individuals and corporations oppose at this time is a bill providing for immediate cash payment to veterans of the World War of the face value of their adjusted-service certificates, and the elimination of interest on these certificates. This one bill will cause to be placed in circulation the sum of $2,000,000,000, and our veterans never needed that money more than they need it now. It will also revive and stimulate business. This can be paid by issuing Treasury notes in small denominations that will circulate as other money, without interest and without increasing taxes. Enact these two bills and you will do a lot to take the profits out of war.

When the French debt to the United States was funded more than $2,000,000,000 of that debt was canceled, and when the Italian debt was funded $1,500,000,000 of that debt was likewise canceled. Then a few days ago, when the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act was passed, it provided for raising $2,000,000,000 more. If this can be done for these foreign countries that owe us and an act can be passed for the benefit of big business, it can also be done for these boys who so valiantly fought and won the greatest war in all history.

If a soldier can carry a gun for $1 per day, then a man can manage those institutions that profited so much in making war material for the same price per day. Why should one man be permitted to make billions manufacturing war material to destroy human lives, and a soldier march and lie out in the rain and mud for $1 per day? No one would even attempt to answer—no one can answer. A soldier can manage those manufacturing establishments just as well as he can carry a gun and fight, and why not do it for the same pay? It can and should be done.

The money cost of the World War to the United States June 30, 1930, amounted to the enormous sum of $51,546,619,000. The obligations of foreign governments to the United States December 31, 1930, amounted to $11,678,093,000. Payments on these debts on June 31, 1930, amounted to the sum of $2,515,013,000. The gross debt of the United States June 30, 1931, amounted to $16,801,281,000. These figures show the enormous cost of the war in money, but that is not as important as the cost in human life.

Every American likes to hear and read of the heroic achievements of our soldiers on the fields of battle. Every heart is thrilled by the courageous deeds of American soldiers on a thousand battlefields. America must keep her promise and continue to do everything possible to care for her soldiers, their wives, and children, and we shall continue to rejoice at their wonderful and heroic achievements.

Let us cheer for those boys to the ends of the earth,
From the mountain's heights to the sea,
In the land where freedom had its birth.
Where manhood still is the highest worth
In the hearts of the noble free.

Let us drink to those boys who march no more
To the call of the drum and the fife,
Who sail the seas with the soundless shore,
Far out from the harbor of life.

Across the sea they bore our flag;
Across the sea they brought it back;
Nor did its shining stars e'er drag,
From sea to sea, from crag to crag,
Along war's grim and gory track.

But, Mr. Chairman, when we think of the 34,249 American boys killed in France during the World War, the 224,089 wounded soldiers, many of whom afterwards died, and the 75,212 little white crosses marking the silent and sleeping dust of American soldiers in a foreign land, it is a different story. We think of the many anxious American mothers still looking for their boys who will never return to them. It is then that we hope there will never be another war. We all suffer in war, but those who suffer the most are the mothers of these soldier boys.

Oh, the bravest battle that ever was fought;
Shall I tell you where and when?
On the map of the world you will find it not;
'Twas fought by the mothers of men.
'Twas not with cannon or battle shot,
With sword or noble pen;
'Twas not with eloquent word or thought,
From lips of wonderful men;
But deep in a welled-up woman's heart;
A woman who would not yield,
But bravely, silently bore her part—
Lo, there is that battlefield.

American lives should not be sacrificed to protect property in foreign lands. Human life is more sacred than any property rights. In China now there are about 9,000 Americans, in addition to the soldiers we have there. American investments in China amount to $250,000,000 in stocks, bonds, and other property. In October, 1929, the administration sent 24 officers and 295 enlisted men to Nicaragua. There are now in Nicaragua 110 officers and 880 enlisted men of the Marine Corps. The first contingent of the marines landed there January 10, 1927. They were sent there to protect interests of certain wealthy Americans who own property in Nicaragua to the amount of $15,000,000. The Government should recall them, that no more of our boys shall be killed in foreign lands.

Mr. Chairman, let us do our utmost to promote the principles of peace and brotherhood throughout the world, and return to the gentle and Christian teachings of the Saviour of Mankind. It is time to act and not delay this legislation longer. I hope Congress does not adjourn until a law is enacted to take the profits out of war. We should never permit ourselves and our Nation to be placed in such a position as to embarrass our country by foreign investments, and the best way to avoid this is to have proper national leadership. Let us remember the enormous profits made during the World War by these cowardly and unscrupulous profiteers who profited on the blood of American boys and upon the sadness and tears of American mothers and fathers, and enact legislation that will forever put an end to such profiteering. [Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. PATMAN].

WHY THE ADJUSTED-SERVICE CERTIFICATES SHOULD BE PAID IN CASH NOW

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, I have been informed today by Mr. John Arthur Shaw, Director of the Veterans' Employment Service, Department of Labor, that there are 750,000 able-bodied World War veterans unemployed, 75,000 veterans with disabilities unemployed, and 800,000 veterans who are working part time from one to four days a week and in most cases at greatly reduced wages. This statement by Mr. Shaw, which is the very best information obtainable on the subject, discloses that at least 1,600,000 veterans need their money at this time.

Under leave to extend my remarks, the following is inserted:

Three million six hundred thousand adjusted-service certificates are held by that number of veterans of the World War. These veterans reside in every nook and corner of America. The average value of the certificates is $1,000. The certificates do not represent a bonus; they represent an honest debt that has been confessed by Congress for services rendered. Each holder of a certificate was really due an amount equal to the face or maturity value of his certificate October 1, 1931. Two billion two hundred million dollars will pay this debt in full.

The average veteran has borrowed 50 per cent of his certificate, the limit allowed by law. He is paying compound interest on this loan to a bank or to the Government—the one holding his certificate as collateral security for the 50 per cent loan. If the remaining 50 per cent is not paid to the veteran now, it will practically be consumed by compound interest. The veterans and their families need the money much worse than the banks or the Government need it in compound interest. If it is paid now, the entire Nation will be benefited by the additional purchasing power being placed into the hands of so many consumers who will put it into circulation. It will not be hoarded.

At least 2,500,000 of these veterans need their money to purchase comforts and necessities of life or to pay debts which they owe and on which they are paying as high as 10 per cent interest. More than 720,000 of these veterans were unemployed when they obtained their 50 per cent loans, so an investigation made by the Veterans' Administration disclosed.

We have sufficient idle gold in the Treasury of the United States to authorize the issuance of Treasury notes—legal-tender currency—to pay this debt in full. Experts tell us that our country needs a moderate expansion of the currency. In this way the debt can be paid without a bond issue, without increasing taxes, and without additional interest payments. The debt must be paid some time. Everybody will be helped if it is paid now.

The Government will be saved tens of millions of dollars annually in administration expenses if the certificates are paid now.

Through the cooperation of the Veterans of Foreign Wars a statement has been prepared which shows the amount of money that will be paid to the veterans in each county in each State in the United States if H. R. 1, the full-payment bill, becomes a law. This statement shows the amount due after deducting prior loans and interest on these loans. You may examine the statement and determine for yourself the question—which will promote the general welfare of the people of this Nation to the greatest extent, to pay this money now or permit the banks and the Government to consume it by compound interest?

The following table, compiled from information obtained from the Veterans' Administration, is self-explanatory:

Column 1: Names of counties, except in Louisiana, where the names of the parishes are given.

Column 2: The approximate amount that will be paid to holders of adjusted-service certificates in each county if H. R. 1 becomes a law.

Counties and amount to be paid to holders of adjusted-service certificates if H. R. 1 becomes a law

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. McREYNOLDS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 9349 and had come to no resolution thereon.

HORACIO DE JESUS CASTILLO (H. DOC. NO. 256)

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States, which was read, and, with the accompanying papers, referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs and ordered printed:

To the Congress of the United States:

I transmit herewith a report by the Secretary of State recommending the enactment of legislation authorizing an appropriation in the sum of $1,000, in settlement of the claim presented against the Government of the United States on behalf of Horacio de Jesus Castillo, a citizen of Nicaragua, as compensation for personal injuries sustained by him as the result of an assault alleged to have been committed upon him by a member of the United States Marine Corps, at Matagalpa, Nicaragua, on February 24, 1931.

I recommend that the Congress enact legislation authorizing an appropriation in the amount mentioned in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of State.

HERBERT HOOVER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 18, 1932.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. DREWRY, for an indefinite period, on account of illness.

WREATH ON THE GRAVE OF THE MOTHER OF WASHINGTON

The SPEAKER laid before the House, House Concurrent Resolution 19, providing wreath to be placed on the grave of the mother of Washington, on February 22, 1932, with a Senate amendment thereto.

The Clerk read the Senate amendment.

The Senate amendment was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman tell us the program for the next two days, and the first part of the next week?

Mr. RAINEY. We expect to convene at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning and at 11 o'clock on Saturday morning, and at the present time we expect to hold a session on Monday, commencing at 1 o'clock, but that is subject to amendment. We will announce the program definitely to-morrow.

Mr. SNELL. I apprehend that the exercises will take only a very short time on Monday.

Mr. RAINEY. The exercises will commence at 11.30 o'clock a. m. and end at 12.30 p. m. We could hold a session at 1 o'clock in the afternoon, unless there is too much objection to it. I shall make that announcement to-morrow.

Mr. SNELL. Does the gentleman know what will come up the first part of next week?

Mr. RAINEY. We expect to go ahead with this present bill and to pass it by Tuesday night. Wednesday will be Calendar Wednesday, and on Thursday we will take up the Treasury Department appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

2355. Also, petition of officers of the First Presbyterian Sabbath School of Vandergrift, Pa., representing more than 700 members, urging support of the eighteenth amendment, Volstead Act, and other enforcement measures; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

2356. Also, petition of members of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Ligonier, Pa., representing 475 members, opposing modification of the eighteenth amendment; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

2357. Also, petition of the congregation of the United Presbyterian Church of New Alexandria, Pa., opposing resubmission of the eighteenth amendment to be ratified by State conventions or State legislatures, and urging Representatives in Congress and Senators to vote against such resolutions and for adequate appropriations for law enforcement and for education in law observance; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

2358. Also, petition of officers and members of the First United Presbyterian Bible school of Vandergrift, Pa., opposing modification or repeal of the eighteenth amendment; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

2359. Also, petition of officers and members of the Sunday school of the First Presbyterian Church of Avonmore, Pa., opposing repeal of the eighteenth amendment; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

2360. Also, petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Greensburg, representing 1,500 people, opposing resubmission of the eighteenth amendment to be ratified by State conventions or State legislatures, and urging Representatives in Congress and Senators to vote against such resolutions and for adequate appropriations for law enforcement and for education in law observance; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

2361. Also, petition of the sixth Sunday-school district of Westmoreland County Sunday School Association, representing 21 schools and over 3,000 scholars, opposing modification of the eighteenth amendment; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

2362. Also, petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Unions of Ruffsdale and Tarr, Westmoreland County, Pa., opposing resubmission of the eighteenth amendment to be ratified by State conventions or State legislatures, and urging Representative in Congress and Senators to vote against such resolutions, and for adequate appropriations for law enforcement and for education in law observance; to the Committee on the Judiciary.

2363. By the SPEAKER: Petition of Korean National Organization, urging the United States Government to continue its efforts to induce, by truce or international arbitration, an immediate cessation of hostilities in Manchuria and Shanghai; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

SENATE

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1932

(Legislative day of Wednesday, February 17, 1932)

The Senate met at 12 o'clock meridian, on the expiration of the recess.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will receive a message from the House of Representatives.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. Haltigan, one of its clerks, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the concurrent resolution (H. Con. Res. 19) providing a wreath to be placed on the grave of the mother of Washington on February 22, 1932.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED

The message also announced that the Speaker had affixed his signature to the following enrolled bills and joint resolution, and they were signed by the President pro tempore:

H. R. 81. An act granting the consent of Congress to the Catawissa Railroad Co. to reconstruct, maintain, and operate a railroad bridge across the Susquehanna River at or near Catawissa, Pa.;

H. R. 6304. An act to transfer Lavaca County from the Houston division to the Victoria division of the southern judicial district of Texas;

H. R. 7247. An act authorizing the Rhode Island State Board of Public Roads and the State Highway Department of the State of Connecticut to construct, maintain, and operate a free highway bridge across the Pawcatuck River near the location of the present Broad Street Bridge between Westerly, R. I., and Stonington, Conn.; and

H. J. Res. 271. Joint resolution amending section 1 of the act entitled "An act authorizing the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes," approved July 3, 1930, relating to the Mississippi River between the mouth of the Illinois River and Minneapolis.

CALL OF THE ROLL

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey [Mr. KEAN] has the floor on Senate bill 3616, the unfinished business.

Mr. FESS. Mr. President, will the Senator from New Jersey yield to me to enable me to suggest the absence of a quorum?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New Jersey yield for that purpose?

Mr. KEAN. I yield.

Mr. FESS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present.

PLACING OF WREATH ON GRAVE OF MOTHER OF WASHINGTON

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair, in accordance with the provisions of House Concurrent Resolution No. 19, appoints the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] to place on behalf of the Senate a wreath on the grave of Mary, the mother of Washington, at Fredericksburg, Va., on February 22, 1932.

ADDITIONAL AWARDS TO PUEBLO INDIANS, NEW MEXICO

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the President of the United States, together with an accompanying letter from the Director of the Bureau of the Budget, transmitting, pursuant to law, a supplemental estimate of appropriation for the Department of the Interior for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, amounting to $55,502.02, required for the payment of additional awards in favor of the Pueblo Indians in New Mexico, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

CLAIMS FROM EXPLOSIONS AT AMMUNITION DEPOT, LAKE DENMARK, N. J.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a letter from the Comptroller General of the United States, transmitting, pursuant to law, a report of a reinvestigation of certain personal injury and property-damage claims received from the explosions at the naval ammunition depot, Lake Denmark, N. J., July 10, 1926, together with his recommendations thereon, which, with the accompanying report, was referred to the Committee on Claims.

THE MOTION-PICTURE INDUSTRY

Mr. BROOKHART. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that on Tuesday, when the unfinished business is reached at the end of the morning hour, I shall address the Senate on the subject of the moving-picture industry.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the Legislature of South Carolina, which was referred to the Committee on Finance:

A concurrent resolution relating to a preferential excise tax on tobacco products manufactured from tobacco purchased from the farmers of South Carolina

Whereas the Secretary of the Treasury has recommended a material increase in the excise taxes on manufactured tobacco products and hearings on these recommendations are now being conducted by the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives; and

Whereas even the present excise taxes on tobacco products are considerably higher than the price paid for tobacco as it leaves the farm, as illustrated by the facts that the present tax on manufactured tobacco (in which form 70 per cent of the entire South Carolina tobacco crop is consumed) is 18 cents per pound, equivalent to 10.8 cents on the unmanufactured tobacco as it leaves the farm, while the average price realized by the farmers of South Carolina in the last 10 years has been but 9 cents per pound; and

Whereas an increase in the excise taxes will render this disparity even greater and will very probably operate to further reduce the return to the grower, it being proposed to increase the excise tax on manufactured tobacco to 21 cents, which is equivalent to 12.6 cents on the raw material as it leaves the farm, while the price realized by the tobacco growers of this State on their 1931 crop is less than 7 cents per pound, making the proposed tax 180 per cent of the return received by the grower; and

Whereas both the Federal and State Governments are committed to the policy of aiding the farmers to the end that farmers may secure a better price for their products; and

Whereas this policy can best be given practical application as far as the tobacco growers are concerned through a provision in the Federal excise tax laws allowing a reduction equivalent to 4 cents per pound on the unmanufactured tobacco in the tax payable on tobacco products manufactured from tobacco purchased from the farmers; and

Whereas this is a practical measure of farm relief for a large group of farmers in this country who are in a very serious situation: Therefore be it

Resolved by the house of representatives (the senate concurring), That the Legislature of South Carolina hereby respectfully memorializes the Congress of the United States not to increase the excise tax on manufactured tobacco unless this is absolutely necessary in balancing the Federal Budget, and in any event to allow a reduction equivalent to 4 cents per pound on the unmanufactured tobacco in the excise taxes payable on all tobacco products manufactured from tobacco purchased from or through the farmers of America; be it further

Resolved, That properly attested copies of this resolution be transmitted to both Houses of Congress of the United States, to the Ways and Means Committee of the House of Representatives, the Finance Committee of the United States Senate, the Committee on Agriculture of the House of Representatives, the Federal Farm Board, and to each of the United States Senators from South Carolina and each South Carolina Member of the House of Representatives.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Columbia, S. C., February 17, 1932.

I hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of a resolution adopted by the house of representatives and concurred in by the senate.

[SEAL.]

J. WILSON GIBBES,
Clerk of the House.

Mr. WATSON presented memorials numerously signed by sundry citizens of the State of Indiana, remonstrating against the passage of legislation providing for the closing of barber shops on Sunday in the District of Columbia, or any other restrictive religious measures, which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts presented memorials of sundry citizens of the State of Massachusetts, remonstrating against the passage of legislation providing for the closing of barber shops on Sunday in the District of Columbia, or any other restrictive religious measures, which were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. KEAN presented a resolution adopted by Group No. 1728 of the Polish National Alliance of Sayreville, N. J., favoring the passage of legislation requesting the President to proclaim October 11 of each year as General Pulaski's Memorial Day, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHEPPARD presented a memorial in the form of a resolution of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Edinburg, Tex. (representing 35 signatures), remonstrating against the resubmission of the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution, and favoring the making of adequate appropriations for law enforcement, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CAPPER presented petitions of members of the local chapter of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Oakley; members of the congregation of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Sterling, and sundry citizens of Attica, Harper, and Plevna, all in the State of Kansas, praying for the maintenance of the prohibition law and its enforcement, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented resolutions adopted by the Men's Bible Class, of Attica; the West Glendale monthly meeting of the Society of Friends, of Plains; the First and Blue Mound Methodist Episcopal Churches, of Baxter Springs; the local chapter of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Plevna, and the Chalitso Club, of Topeka, all in the State of Kansas, favoring the maintenance of the prohibition law and its enforcement, and protesting against any measure looking toward its modification, resubmission to the States, or repeal, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WAGNER presented resolutions adopted by the Rotary Club of Pleasantville, N. Y., favoring the prompt ratification of the World Court protocols, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Resolutions on World Court

Whereas modern warfare involves not merely armies and navies but entire peoples; and

Whereas war, because of its insatiable demands for human life, for accumulated wealth, and for the peace-time bondage of entire peoples who must labor to fulfill its requirements in reparations, debts, armaments, and pensions, threatens the very structure of our present economic and political organization; and

Whereas the scale on which modern warfare is conducted makes it impossible to predict its outcomes or control, and limit its effects; and

Whereas approximately 60 nations in recognition of these truths have signed the Kellogg-Briand peace pact, pledging themselves to renounce war as an instrument of national policy; and

Whereas there is provided in the World Court a means for the pacific settlement of international disputes; and

Whereas the 60 nations who are members of the World Court have accepted the Root formula for meeting the reservations of the Senate of the United States; and

Whereas a resolution providing for the adherence of the United States to the World Court is now in the custody of the Committee on Foreign Relations: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Rotary Club of Pleasantville, N. Y., record itself as strongly favoring the early submission of the resolution for adherence to the World Court to the Senate and its passage by that body during the present session of the Seventy-second Congress; and be it further

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent to the Senators from New York, to the chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, to Rotary International, and to the other Rotary Clubs of the twenty-ninth district.

Mr. WAGNER also presented a letter embodying resolutions adopted at a meeting of the Somerset Woman's Christian Temperance Union, at Albany, N. Y., favoring prohibition enforcement, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ALBANY, N. Y., February 17, 1932.

Hon. ROBERT F. WAGNER,
Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: The following resolution was passed on February 16, 1932, at a meeting of Somerset Union, Woman's Christian Temperance Union, consisting of a membership of 130.

A movement for the resubmission of the eighteenth amendment would greatly augment the present agitation, would cause great expense to the people, would hinder enforcement of the law, and, no matter what the outcome, would not result in any cessation of the hostility of the enemies of prohibition. Prohibition is entitled to a fair chance.

"Resolved, That we are opposed to resubmission of national prohibition to the States by a resolution to submit a repeal amendment either to State conventions or to State legislatures for ratification.

"Resolved, That we request our Congressmen to vote 'No' on any resubmission resolution that may be presented in Congress."

Very truly yours,

CHARLOTTE B. REESE,
Recording Secretary.

Mr. WAGNER also presented a resolution adopted by the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Eden, N. Y., favoring prohibition enforcement, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To the Senate:

Whereas the eighteenth amendment was adopted by the orderly processes of government and has been sustained by no less than 48 decisions of the United States Supreme Court; and

Whereas its opponents are now asking Congress to resubmit the question of prohibition through a repeal amendment to be ratified by State conventions called for that purpose; and

Whereas we have no reason to believe that those opponents who have not counseled obedience to the eighteenth amendment and its enforcement act and those who have openly advocated disobedience and disregard of same, which is selective anarchy, would change their attitude and accept the vote of the majority of the States should the repeal amendment fail of ratification; and

Resolved, That we are opposed to the resubmission of the eighteenth amendment to be ratified by the State conventions or by State legislatures, and that we ask our Congressman from this district and our United States Senators to vote against such a resolution and to vote for adequate appropriations for law enforcement and for education in law observance.

Adopted by the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Eden, N. Y.

HELEN A. CASTULINE, Acting President.

EDEN, N. Y., February 17, 1932.

Mr. WAGNER also presented a resolution adopted by the Home Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church of Canajoharie, N. Y., identical with the above printed resolution favoring prohibition enforcement, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition signed by Mrs. M. Van Derzell and sundry other citizens of Penfield and East Rochester, N. Y., favoring prohibition enforcement which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary and ordered to be printed in the RECORD without the signatures, as follows:

Hon. ROBERT F. WAGNER,
United States Senator:

In view of the many bills that have been submitted to Congress by the opponents of prohibition, we the undersigned urge that you use your influence and cast your vote in support of the maintenance of the prohibition law and its enforcement, and against any measure looking toward its modification, resubmission to the States, or repeal, and that this petition be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

Mr. WAGNER also presented a petition signed by Josephine Unverzagt and sundry other citizens of Ellenville, N. Y., identical with the above printed petition, favoring prohibition enforcement, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REDUCTION OF GOVERNMENTAL EXPENDITURES

Mr. BARBOUR presented a letter from J. L. K. Snyder, of Phillipsburg, N. J., relative to governmental expenditures and the balancing of the Budget, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PHILLIPSBURG, N. J., February 17, 1932.

Hon. WARREN BARBOUR,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR BARBOUR: Both personally and in business many of us have had to reduce expenditures very greatly during the last year or two in order to keep within our incomes. I believe that this has been a sounder policy than to borrow the funds necessary to maintain our establishments on a predepression basis.

In view of this belief and this experience, I have viewed with grave concern the large deficit which the Federal Government has incurred during the years 1931 and 1932 and will incur during 1933, even if the appropriations are reduced as recommended by the administration and if new and increased taxes yield the additional revenue which is anticipated.

The experiences of Australia, Great Britain, and many countries on the continent of Europe are vivid, and the mounting deficits in our National Budget can not but make us wonder how long we can continue to follow in their footsteps without seriously undermining confidence in our national solvency. The deficit figures, coupled with the estimates of revenue and expenditure for recent fiscal year, speak for themselves:

	1930	1931	1932	1933
Income	$3,846,010,000	$2,317,233,000	$2,359,469,000	$2,695,960,000
Expenditure	3,846,605,000	3,219,950,000	4,482,153,000	4,112,909,000
Deficit	−595,000	−902,716,000	−2,122,683,000	−1,416,949,000

During the present year the deficit of the Federal Government is almost as large as its entire income, and for 7 out of 12 months expenditure has been made on this basis. Few business concerns or individuals would even dare to consider the adoption of such a program. If the position is to be remedied, there is no time to be lost. Congress appears to be beginning to see the necessity for action, but I do not believe it is possible to overemphasize the urgency of the matter.

I have before me the balance of ordinary receipts and expenditures, year by year since 1791, and I think it is not too much to say that except in time of war the national finances have never been in such an unsatisfactory state since the founding of the Republic. For nearly 30 years after the Civil War, during that most difficult reconstruction period, our Budget was balanced every year. Now it is proposed in the three years 1931–1933 to accumulate a deficit equal to over half our estimated income and increase our national debt by approximately 20 per cent.

The taxpayers are ready to do their part. They will not do so with good will, however, unless they are convinced that our Government is prepared to follow the lead given them by corporations and individuals and drastically reduce Federal expenditure. The people of this country are of the opinion that the Government is too much in business and that many of the offices and bureaus created during the past few years should be drastically reduced or entirely eliminated.

The ordinary expenditure of the Federal Government (that is, excluding debt payment) during recent years is nearly five times as great as that during the decade preceding the World War. Such expenditure in 1932 is more than 50 per cent greater than in 1925. During these seven years the cost of our national defense has gone up 20 per cent, over $100,000,000. I do not know of any menace to our Nation sufficient to justify such an additional outlay. Our veterans should be suitably provided for, but an annual expenditure for this purpose of over $1,000,000,000, or not far from one-half of the income of the Federal Government this year, seems excessive. This is equal to $500 for every man in our uniform who went overseas during the war period 15 years ago.

The expenditure of the Department of Agriculture and the Department of Commerce is now nearly two and one-half times greater than in 1924. It occurs to me that much of the work of the former might be done more appropriately by State and county organizations and that with the present tendency toward higher and higher customs tariffs in all countries large expenditures on the development of export trade may not be warranted.

The number of "independent establishments," exclusive of the Veterans' Administration, has increased of late. It is estimated that they will cost $52,000,000 in 1933. Of this total approximately $10,000,000 is for the Federal Board for Vocational Education, $9,000,000 for the Interstate Commerce Commission, $2,000,000 for the Federal Farm Board, $1,000,000 for the Federal Trade Commission, and $1,000,000 for the Tariff Commission. The work done by these and many other Federal offices is no doubt of interest and value to many of our citizens. Whether they are all worth their cost under present conditions is another matter. Some of them could perhaps be combined usefully with regular Government departments in order that economies might be effected.

Citizens like myself who are fully occupied with our own affairs can not attempt to indicate exactly where savings can be effected. We expect our Representatives in Congress and in other Government or party circles to take the necessary action.

I believe, however, that you may wish to know from time to time how we feel on matters of such importance—and I have no hesitation in saying that in my opinion Congress can do no more useful service to the country at the present time than that of balancing the National Budget through drastic reduction in Federal expenditures. I believe, too, that, although efforts in this direction may create opposition and discontent in quarters affected directly, they will appeal to the general public and that they will win the support of the business men of your constituency.

A budget balanced without large borrowing would do more than anything else to restore and sustain confidence in the credit of the Federal Government. No platform or policy would in my opinion win such genuine and widespread support as that of early and radical reduction in Federal expenditure. Every man or woman knows, in many cases from sad experience, the necessity of balancing the family budget. I believe that the party which goes to the country at the next election with a record of definite effort or achievement in Congress along these lines and with a program for future economy and deflation of the Federal Government will have a very strong position.

I have no doubt that this matter is also on your mind, and I should appreciate it very much, indeed, if you would be good enough to let me know if there is any prospect that action will be taken along these lines.

Yours very truly, J. L. K. SNYDER.

THE PURCHASE OF MUNICIPAL WARRANTS BY FEDERAL RESERVE BANKS

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, in view of the difficulties that the cities and towns in various parts of the country have experienced from being unable to borrow money in anticipation of taxes I appealed to the governor of the Federal Reserve Board to aid these cities and towns by requesting the Federal reserve banks to purchase certain classes of municipal warrants.

I ask that this correspondence be printed in the RECORD, and I particularly call attention to the fact that the board of directors of each regional reserve bank has discretion in the purchase of municipal warrants; and I hope this discretion will be exercised to relieve the economic stress in the borrowing opportunities of our cities.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letters are as follows:

FEBRUARY 11, 1932.

Hon. EUGENE MEYER,
Governor Federal Reserve Board, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR GOVERNOR MEYER: There is an acute credit situation in Massachusetts cities and towns.

It has been the custom in these cities and towns in January of each year to borrow money in anticipation of taxes that will be received in September and October. This year the banks are refusing to make these loans to the cities and towns, because they allege they must keep 60 per cent liquid and do not dare tie up their funds, since they can not rediscount these notes with Federal reserve banks.

Some of the newspapers have discussed the situation, and there seems to be a general feeling that the Federal reserve banks should rediscount this paper. As I understand the Federal reserve act, it states:

"Every Federal reserve bank shall have power to buy and sell * * * warrants with a maturity from date of purchase of not exceeding six months, issued in anticipation of the collection of taxes or in anticipation of the receipt of assured revenues by any State, county, district, political subdivision, or municipality in the continental United States * * *."

As I understand the situation, the Federal reserve bank in Boston can buy these tax notes, but it does not. It has left that business, usually a very attractive one, to the private banks. I have been urged to call to your attention the importance of the Federal reserve bank exercising this function, now that the private banks are contracting their functions.

May I have the views of the members of your board on this important subject, particularly as it is requested by a prominent Boston newspaper which has made a study of this situation and has been publishing a series of articles concerning the same.

Very truly yours,

DAVID I. WALSH.

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD,
Washington, February 18, 1932.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WALSH: Because of the numerous other matters which, as you know, have required my attention, I regret that I have not been able to make an earlier reply to your letter of February 11 regarding the purchase of municipal warrants by Federal reserve banks.

As you indicate, the law and the regulations of the board authorize the Federal reserve banks to purchase certain classes of municipal warrants. However, as you know, under the law municipal warrants can not be used by Federal reserve banks as collateral for the issuance of Federal reserve notes. Therefore, the question whether and to what extent a Federal reserve bank may purchase such warrants, in view of its other responsibilities, is one primarily for the exercise of the discretion of the board of directors of that bank, and the question you raise has been brought to the attention of the Federal Reserve Bank of Boston for its consideration.

Very truly yours,

EUGENE MEYER, Governor.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

Mr. REED, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (S. 3547) to authorize the Secretary of War to acquire, exchange, transfer, and sell certain tracts of real estate, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments and submitted a report (No. 267) thereon.

Mr. REED also, from the same committee, to which were referred the following bills, reported them severally without amendment and submitted reports thereon:

S. 1855. An act to provide for the care and maintenance of the Guilford Courthouse National Military Park (Rept. No. 268);

AMENDMENT TO AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. BLACK submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 7912, the Agricultural Department appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and to be printed, as follows:

On page 66, strike out all of lines 5 to 9, inclusive, except the words "relief of the State of Alabama" in line 3, and insert the following:

"That the balance of the appropriation of $1,660,000 now unpaid to the State of Alabama, appropriated for the relief of the State of Alabama as a reimbursement or contribution in aid induced by extraordinary floods, shall be paid to the authorities of that State without the requirement that the State match said expenditure except in the manner provided herein."

AMENDMENTS TO INTERIOR DEPARTMENT APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. FRAZIER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 8397, the Interior Department appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed, as follows:

At the top of page 6, to strike out the following:

EXPENSES OF INDIAN COMMISSIONERS

For expenses of the Board of Indian Commissioners, $14,100, of which amount not to exceed $9,000 may be expended for personal services in the District of Columbia.

Mr. ODDIE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to House bill 8397, the Interior Department appropriation bill, in connection with the item for the Boulder Canyon project, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed, as follows:

On page 73, line 14, before the period insert a colon and the following: "Provided further, That of this fund not to exceed $50,000 shall be available for the construction, operation, and maintenance at Boulder City, Nev., of a swimming pool, together with suitable bathhouses and other facilities, for the use of the residents of such community."

PREFERENCE BY PURCHASING OFFICERS TO DOMESTIC ARTICLES

Mr. BINGHAM submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 3349) authorizing the purchasing officers of the Government to give preference to domestic articles, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments and ordered to be printed.

SPIRITUOUS LIQUORS FOR NONBEVERAGE USES

Mr. COPELAND. I ask that the Committee on Appropriations be discharged from the further consideration of the amendment which I submitted to the appropriation bill for the Treasury and Post Office Departments on the 1st instant, and that the amendment be referred to the Committee on Finance, together with the favorable report of the Treasury Department, and that they be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the Committee on Appropriations was discharged from the further consideration of the amendment, which, with the accompanying letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, was referred to the Committee on Finance and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. COPELAND to the bill (H. R. ——) making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, viz: At the proper place insert the following:

"That hereafter permits for the importation or manufacture for nonbeverage purposes of spirituous liquors of a particular kind or quality may be issued upon a finding by the Commissioner of Industrial Alcohol that the supply of any such kind or quality of liquors in distilleries or bonded warehouses in the United States is insufficient to meet the current need therefor for all nonbeverage uses."

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, February 17, 1932.

DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of a copy of an amendment to be proposed by Senator COPELAND to the House bill making appropriations for the Treasury and Post Office Departments for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933.

Concerning this proposal I beg to state that section 2 of the act supplemental to the national prohibition act (42 Stat. 222), approved November 23, 1921, provides, in part, that:

"* * * No spirituous liquor shall be imported into the United States, nor shall any permit be granted authorizing the manufacture of any spirituous liquor, save alcohol, until the amount of such liquor now in distilleries or other bonded warehouses shall have been reduced to a quantity that, in the opinion of the commissioner, will, with liquor that may hereafter be manufactured and imported, be sufficient to supply the current need thereafter for all nonbeverage uses * * *."

The proposed amendment, if enacted, would modify the provisions of this act, which was construed by the Attorney General (34 Op. Atty. Gen. 103) as forbidding the importation of brandy and other spirits, and wine with certain exceptions, which opinion was adhered to by Assistant Attorney General Youngquist in a letter addressed to Mr. Edward M. Langley, 603 Boylston Street, Boston, Mass., on February 2, 1932.

In view of the fact that the importation of limited quantities of wine for medicinal and sacramental purposes is now permitted under the opinion cited, and that there appears to be a legitimate demand for certain foreign brandies for medicinal use, which brandies are regarded by many physicians as having medicinal virtues superior to domestic spirits, the enactment of the proposed legislation is recommended.

Very truly yours,

OGDEN L. MILLS,
Secretary of the Treasury.

Hon. WESLEY L. JONES,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

PROPOSED MEDITERRANEAN FRUIT-FLY BOARD

Mr. TRAMMELL. Mr. President, I send to the desk a motion to suspend the rules. I desire to have it presented to-day, so that it may be operative to-morrow, if we should have a session to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion will be read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

NOTICE OF MOTION TO SUSPEND RULES

Pursuant to the provisions of Rule XL of the Standing Rules of the Senate, I hereby give notice in writing that I shall hereafter move to suspend paragraphs 1 and 4 of Rule XVI for the purpose of proposing to the bill (H. R. 7912) making appropriations for the Department of Agriculture for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes, the following amendment, viz: On page 94, after line 2, insert a new section, as follows:

SEC. 3. That a board is hereby created, to be known as the Mediterranean Fruit-Fly Board, to be composed of 5 persons, to be appointed by the Secretary of Agriculture, 2 of whom shall be representatives of the Department of Agriculture (1 to be chairman of the board), 2 citizens of the State of Florida, and 1 man at large. Any vacancy occurring in the board shall be filled in the same manner as the original appointment. Each member of the board, other than members holding office under the Federal Government, shall receive compensation at the rate of $10 per day while actually employed on the business of the board. The board shall cease to exist upon transmitting its report as herein provided.

The board is authorized and directed to (1) conduct a complete investigation and survey of actual losses sustained by growers and farmers in the State of Florida resulting directly from the campaign to eradicate the Mediterranean fruit fly in such State; (2) receive claims for actual losses sustained by such persons in the State of Florida by reason of direct damage resulting from such campaign, supported by such proof as the board by regulation may prescribe; (3) report the facts and make findings upon such claims as to the amount of actual loss sustained; and (4) transmit to the Secretary of Agriculture not later than 90 days after the approval of this act a report of the survey and its findings in respect of claims for such losses: Provided, That such report and finding shall serve as information only for consideration and not be binding on the Secretary of Agriculture or Congress. The Secretary of Agriculture shall, within 30 days after receiving such report, or if Congress is not in session, then at the beginning of the December, 1932, session of Congress, transmit such report of survey to Congress, together with such recommendations as he may, in his judgment, deem advisable.

The regular employees of the Department of Agriculture shall be used as far as possible, but the board may, with the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture, appoint in addition thereto and fix the compensation (without regard to the civil service laws and regulations or to the classification act of 1923, as amended) of such other employees as may be necessary, and may, with the approval of the Secretary of Agriculture, make such expenditures, including expenditures for travel and subsistence expenses, for personal services at the seat of government and elsewhere, and for printing and binding as are necessary for the efficient execution of its functions under this section. All expenses of the board shall be allowed and paid upon the presentation of itemized vouchers therefor approved by the chairman of the board and the Secretary of Agriculture.

That there is hereby appropriated the sum of $25,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this section.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will lie on the table and be printed.

HEARINGS BEFORE THE COMMITTEE ON MINES AND MINING

Mr. PATTERSON submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 169), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Committee on Mines and Mining, or any subcommittee thereof, hereby is authorized during the Seventy-second Congress, to send for persons, books, and papers, to administer oaths, and to employ a stenographer at a cost not exceeding 25 cents per hundred words, to report such hearings as may be had on any subject before said committee, the expense thereof to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate; and that the committee, or any subcommittee thereof, may sit during the sessions or recesses of the Senate.

MESSAGES FROM THE PRESIDENT—APPROVAL OF A BILL

Messages in writing from the President of the United States were communicated to the Senate by Mr. Latta, one of his secretaries, who also announced that on February 18, 1932, the President approved and signed the act (S. 366) for the relief of Dr. Luis H. DeBayle.

THE PHILIPPINES QUESTION

Mr. TYDINGS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD a letter written to Members of Congress by Mr. William Wallace McConel, who for six years was a school-teacher in the Philippine Islands. He obtained so much historical data and so much of information pertaining to the Philippines question that I think it would be well to have his letter made a matter of record. I also ask that the letter may be referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The letter will be referred to the Committee on Territories and Insular Affairs and printed in the RECORD.

The letter is as follows:

AN OPEN LETTER TO MEMBERS OF THE UNITED STATES CONGRESS

PORTAGE, PA., February 11, 1932.

HONORABLE SIRS: While the Philippines question is up for discussion allow me to add the view held by an American citizen who has spent six years in the islands, where I have had an opportunity to get first-hand information regarding the situation as it exists there. With your indulgence, I shall endeavor to show briefly why the present Congress should grant Philippine independence: First, from an economic angle; second, from a social angle; and, third, from a political angle.

ECONOMIC

From the time the United States took control of the islands there has been, I am informed, an average expenditure of about $1,000,000 a month to pay salaries and upkeep of our soldiery in the islands. Thirty years of such expense totals $360,000,000. Add to this the initial "purchase" price of $20,000,000 and you have a total of $380,000,000. Again, add to this the cost of transporting soldiers to and from Manila, the expense of American "missions" that were sent out there for one purpose or another, add the salaries of American officials in the islands, add the salaries of Filipino representatives in the United States Congress, add the cost of fortifications, add what other incidentals you care to look up in the War Department, and you will find that through this rat hole there has been draining during these thirty-odd years a sum that runs into many hundred millions of dollars * * * a sum that would have gone a long way toward eliminating illiteracy in some of our backward States; to help perfect a system of national highways; to combat disease or farm pests; or to irrigate the arid regions of the Southwest.

And what has America gained from this expenditure? Outside of the fact that we have strengthened our friendship somewhat in the Orient, we have accomplished but little economically. We have built up something of a Philippine trade * * * but at what price? We have opened our doors for free entry of Philippine goods and Filipino immigrants, to the detriment of America herself. Philippine vegetable oils enter the American market under the guise of butter and lard substitutes and compete with the real article produced by the American taxpayer. Filipino laborers enter the west coast almost without restriction and compete with American labor, thus reducing the standard of living among the laboring class of Americans in that region.

Does the profit on American exports to the Philippines warrant all this outlay of cash and this open-door policy toward Philippine products and Filipino labor? A glance at the figures available in Washington will surely show you that it does not. Moreover, is the United States justified in pouring the American taxpayers' money into the islands at the rate of $12,000,000 annually and thus pensioning the islands to that extent while the natives farm only a small percentage of the available agricultural land which ought to be under cultivation to support the insular government? So long as America pours huge sums into the islands for the salaries and upkeep of both native and American soldiery and so long as the bars are down to Filipino immigration to Hawaii and the United States * * * just so long will the Filipino be led along by an economic mirage instead of settling down to make Philippine industry meet Philippine obligations. America has done much to bring about new standards in roads, schools, sanitation, courts, etc., but to continue such a program would be but to coddle and pamper a people who ought to be solving their own problems in their own way.

So much for the dollars-and-cents side of Philippine independence.

SOCIAL

Regardless of the merits or demerits of any race, there are certain social barriers which make it both difficult and at present undesirable for Americans to marry into another race. Americans are not good mixers in that sense. That is a pretty generally recognized fact even where the difference is only lingual and national as that which exists between Americans and Europeans. How much greater is this social barrier between Americans and orientals! This barrier, as I have pointed out above, does not rest upon the merits or demerits of either race, but rather upon a complexity of details such as linguistic difficulties, moral standards, authority in the home, religious views, dress, and styles of cooking. With such differences it is hard to see how any satisfactory blending of the two races could be effected. And so long as there is no racial blending of these races the Filipino will be a "native" and the American will be a "foreigner," each with his own standards and views, each pulling in his own direction.

Even after more than 30 years of American occupation the average Americans feel like "fish out of water" when in a gathering where Filipinos predominate. Filipinos feel the same when thrown into a gathering of Americans. Individually, they may find admirable qualities in each other and be close friends, but try to mix them in a social way and you are trying to mix oil and water. Put Americans in the provinces where they are thrown entirely among Filipinos and they will be shown the finest courtesies by the natives and may finally get to a point where they feel somewhat satisfied with the social life. But let these Americans then come into the city where there are many other Americans, and the provincial American will gravitate at once toward his countrymen and lose interest in association with the Filipino. American women sometimes dance with the native men in the provinces and then strictly refuse to do so when American and native teachers meet at Teachers' Camp in Baguio, where there are American men to choose from. So long as there is no racial blending, no homogeneity, there will be a diversity of opinion that is not conducive of progress under what the Filipino considers a mandatory system. Much more harmony could be created in joint undertakings if Filipinos were free to seek advice rather than have it handed out to them dogmatically by American officials appointed to their positions.

POLITICAL

From the time that Magellan met death in a quarrel with natives of these islands, the Filipinos have consistently objected to foreign aggression and control. Apparently, the only reason that they received the Americans with open arms at the time of Dewey's victory in Manila Bay was because they thought that America was in accord with their plan to establish an independent republic. Proof of this lies in the fighting which followed between Filipinos and Americans when the Filipino learned that America intended to stay as a sovereign power.

Promises of independence at that time, and more definite promises either spoken or written since that day, have kept the patient Filipino waiting from year to year to see his country set free. If the Philippines were a large and thickly populated country, the inhabitants may have tried more pronounced methods of gaining independence. But they know that they can not match the military and naval strength of a country like America, so they have been compelled to confine their activities to pleading where a stronger nation would have resorted to punching.

During all these years the higher government positions have been filled by American appointees, while Filipino officers of lower rank have acted as buffers between the American officials and the people. This division of authority has often resulted in an old game known as "passing the buck." Only when all officials of the country are responsible to the people of that country can these officials be expected to act to the interests of the people. The great distance between the islands and the United States has resulted in each being pretty generally ignorant of the other's aims, ideals, and customs. This difference makes any American Governor General more or less an unwelcome member of the governing body. Opponents of Philippine freedom may point to some very harmonious periods of cooperation between the American Governor General and the native officials; but were these smoothest periods not the very periods when Filipinos enjoyed the greatest hope of independence? Since that is true, can we go on harmoniously when the Filipino sees his longed-for independence postponed from year to year, first with one excuse and then with another? American control of the government is undesirable to the native, and Filipino control of an American territory would be dangerous to America's international relations. The solution is Philippine independence.

The report is frequently spread in America that Filipinos do not want independence. That is probably the biggest lie that has ever been told about these people. Between 1921 and 1930 I taught hundreds of young men and women in the high schools of the islands and have since kept in touch with many of them while they went through the university and took up some profession. And I have found them almost unanimous in their desire and plea and urge for independence. There are a few who say that they are satisfied to let the present status continue for some time, but they are so few in number and their voice is so weak that they are completely drowned out by the multitude who ask that they be allowed to govern themselves as other self-respecting people do.

Among Americans who oppose independence most strongly are those who have fed on the American pap so long that they don't see how they could get along without it. Another group is composed of those who took a gambler's chance on investing money out there with the expectation that they could secure larger earnings from investment there than they could in the States. They want the American Government and the American Army and Navy to guard their investment, while the American taxpayer foots the bill at $12,000,000 annually.

To summarize the points that I have endeavored to make clear in the above statements, let me repeat that—

Economically, the United States is losing instead of gaining so long as we hold the Philippine Islands.

Socially, there can be no hope for absorption of Filipinos by Americans or Americans by Filipinos so as to bring about a homogeneity of aims, ideals, and customs.

Politically, the islands would be a burden instead of a help to the United States in time of war; Americans and Filipinos are constantly misunderstanding each other; and the doctrine of self-determination should be practiced as well as preached.

My personal dealings with Filipinos since 1921 has convinced me that the Filipino looks upon individual Americans as friends and will endeavor to treat fairly all Americans who deal fairly with the Filipinos under an independent government. If you, as an American, were subject to a foreign power as the Filipino is subject to America, what would be your aspirations? May we ask you to consider the Filipino in the same light, and to cast your vote on the side for Philippine freedom when the opportunity presents itself in connection with pending legislation?

Respectfully yours,

WILLIAM WALLACE MCCONEL,
Formerly with the Bureau of Education.

EMERGENCY CREDIT EXPANSION

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. 3616) to improve the facilities of the Federal reserve system for the service of commerce, industry, and agriculture, to provide means for meeting the needs of member banks in exceptional circumstances, and for other purposes.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, I was much impressed by the statement of the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON] as to the origin of what we are trying to do here to broaden the basis of the Federal reserve act. He pointed out that several prominent Democrats introduced bills and had thought of the proposition. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. VANDENBERG] pointed out that he had introduced bills and had tried through those bills to get something done along this line. I myself have visited the Federal Reserve Board months and years ago and tried to get something done that would be of some benefit to the country banks.

Mr. President, I am for the Glass bill, S. 3616. Credit in the United States has practically stopped. To start this credit again we must in some way broaden the base of discounts of the Federal reserve banks. What has happened to the banks is that they have held bonds of the United States, bonds of municipalities, bonds of the railroads, and bonds of the industrial corporations of the country; and these bonds, which they held as a secondary reserve in the case of a large number of people demanding their money, have so far gone down in value that the amount of secondary reserve is out of proportion to their other securities. In order to rectify this condition the pending bill broadens to a small extent and in a very conservative way paper that can be discounted by the Federal reserve banks. The member banks are anxious at the present time, and so far as I know have never refused, to buy paper that was discountable at the Federal reserve banks; but, on the other hand, conditions being such as they are they have been obliged to refuse accommodations to the ordinary borrower.

Before the establishment of the Federal reserve bank every country bank kept an account in the central cities, such as Chicago, New York, and Philadelphia, to which they sent their out-of-town collections. The difference in time between the day on which the out-of-town bank was credited for its out-of-town collections and the day they were received by the metropolitan banks furnished the metropolitan banks with a very substantial portion of their deposits. In case of trouble the metropolitan banks would rediscount for the country banks almost any security that the country banks were satisfied with, so that the country banks were dependent upon their correspondents in time of trouble, and their correspondents lost practically no money in taking care of their country depositors.

Many years ago the New York banks and, later, banks in other cities formed clearing houses. The working of the clearing houses is about as follows: A clerk from a bank belonging to the clearing house goes to the clearing house at 9 o'clock in the morning, and by 10 o'clock the checks of the various members of the clearing house are sorted so that each bank knows whether it has a debit or a credit at the clearing house, differences being settled in cash by 10 or 11 o'clock each morning. In times of panic it was found impossible for the clearing-house banks always to settle their differences in cash, so that the custom grew up of issuing clearing-house certificates bearing 6 per cent interest, and these were used by the banks in settling their differences when, owing to the financial strain, they did not feel they could settle in cash.

When the Federal reserve banks were started it was supposed that they would be able at all times to take care of the credit requirements of both the metropolitan and the country banks, but the requirements and rules of the Federal reserve banks for eligibility of discount are such that the majority of country banks have little or no paper which can be rediscounted at a Federal reserve bank. This condition has been intensified of late years. During the boom times many corporations, whose stocks were listed on the exchanges, found their common stocks selling at such prices that the management thought it wise to sell an increased amount of their common stocks, thereby giving them a cash position and making it unnecessary to borrow on their paper. This reduced the paper eligible for discount in the Federal reserve banks and has made a large contraction in the amount of paper acceptable for rediscount. The country banks were urged to buy the bonds of these corporations as a secondary reserve. Many of the country banks did so, and the market has so declined for these and other bonds that they are unsalable at the present time. On the other hand, they are obliged to keep a large proportion of their deposits with the Federal reserve banks, for which they are getting no interest. Formerly the national banks always allowed them interest on their deposits.

The metropolitan banks, wishing to keep themselves as liquid as possible, and as the country banks do not keep anything like the deposits with them that they used to keep, refuse to rediscount for the country banks notes that are not eligible for rediscount at the Federal reserve banks.

According to the Federal Reserve Bulletin of January, 1932, page 14, up to September 30, 1931, member banks had on deposit $29,469,000,000. This being so, a fairly conservative bank ought to have, first 15 per cent in cash at least, second 35 per cent of the $29,469,000,000 in some form of secondary reserve, on which they can obtain money. Thirty-five per cent of that amount would be $9,150,000,000, and, according to the distinguished Senator from Virginia, the banks have only $8,561,000,000 of unused paper rediscountable at the Federal reserve bank. They can not loan to ordinary customers except on paper rediscountable at the Federal reserve bank, certainly until they get their secondary reserve up above 35 per cent, and the figures show that they are more than a billion short of the necessary 35 per cent.

According to the report of the Comptroller of the Currency issued a day or so ago, deposits in the member banks had decreased during 1931, $4,137,398,000, and since September such deposits had decreased $1,083,778,000—a tremendous drop.

Mr. President, in considering this subject, some mention of the policy of the Federal reserve system regarding the control of reserve credit in 1927 and 1928 must be made. It will be remembered that during 1927 the Federal Reserve Board inaugurated an easy money policy and, at the end of that year, discount rates throughout the system were at 3½ per cent, or one-half per cent lower than at the close of 1926. These rates remained in effect until the early part of 1928, when it was evident that increasingly large amounts of banking and other credit were being employed in the stock market for speculative purposes. As a result, the Federal Reserve Board moved to restrict the use of reserve credit in the stock market and, during the year, the buying rates for acceptances were raised, while discount rates of the reserve banks were successively increased until on December 31, 1928, the rate stood at 5 per cent for all of the banks, with the exception of those at Minneapolis, Kansas City, Dallas, and San Francisco, in which centers it remained at 4½ per cent until the early months of 1929. Furthermore, considerable sales of the system's holdings of Government securities were made, reducing the amount held on January 4, of $423,159,000 to $75,592,000 on December 29, of $347,567,000. Reflecting this tightening of reserve credit and the growing demand for speculative funds, the renewal rate for call loans mounted steadily during the year and the average rate for the week ended December 29 stood at 10 per cent, the high point of the year, as against the low for the year of 3.70 per cent, the average for the week of January 28. In addition to these efforts, the Federal Reserve Board issued warnings against unwise use of credit in speculative channels.

THE YEAR 1929

At the beginning of 1929 the Federal Reserve Board found itself in a particularly difficult position. On the one hand, it had made definite efforts to control the use of its funds for speculative purposes, but found that such attempts had been of little value, inasmuch as brokers' loans had continued to mount through the medium of loans to brokers placed by banks for the account of corporations, individuals, and foreign lenders; and stock values had continued in general to move upward, reflecting the widespread optimism throughout the country, which arose from prosperous business conditions. On the other hand, business at the start of the year was active and gave promise of continued improvement with the coming of spring and summer. Consequently further increases in Federal-reserve discount rates, buying rates on acceptances, and restriction of reserve credit through open-market operations, while perhaps effective as brakes to speculative sentiment, might have resulted in being decided handicaps to business throughout the country. Therefore the Federal Reserve Board, at its meeting in Washington on February 6, 1929, decided to issue a statement against further unwise use of banking credit for speculation, but voted not to increase discount rates.

FEDERAL RESERVE STATEMENT OF FEBRUARY 6

Pertinent and trenchant portions of the Reserve Board's statement included such remarks as the following:

> The extraordinary absorption of funds in speculative loans which has characterized the credit movement during the past year or more deserves particular attention lest it become a decisive factor working toward still further firming of money rates, to the prejudice of the country's commercial interests.

That the board was fully alive to the dangers inherent in the situation was forcefully expressed by the words:

> The matter is one that concerns every section of the country and every business interest, as an aggravation of these conditions may be expected to have detrimental effects on business and may impair its future.

Then, addressing itself directly to its member banks, the board said:

> The Federal reserve act does not, in the opinion of the Federal Reserve Board, contemplate the use of the resources of the Federal reserve banks for the creation or extension of speculative credit. A member bank is not within its reasonable claims for rediscounting facilities at the Federal reserve bank when it borrows either for the purpose of making speculative loans or for the purpose of maintaining speculative loans.

And, further outlining its own responsibility in this connection, it stated:

> The board has a grave responsibility whenever there is evidence that member banks are maintaining speculative security loans with the aid of Federal reserve credit * * * when such is the case, the Federal reserve bank becomes either a contributing or sustaining factor in the current volume of speculative security credit * * * this is not in harmony with the intent of the Federal reserve act, nor is it conducive to the wholesome operation of the banking and credit system of the country.

That the Federal reserve system had not failed and did not fail to discharge its responsibility in these respects is clearly apparent by the system's actions throughout 1928 and in 1929 until the stock market collapsed later in the year. Concrete evidence in support of this assertion, as applying to 1928, has been given. As to the measures taken by the reserve system during the period from January 1, 1929, to the time of the publication of the foregoing remarks, it is very significant that the Federal reserve system curtailed its buying of bills in the open market from $484,358,000 to $410,742,000, a decrease of $73,616,000, and restricted its buying of Government securities by $43,864,000. Furthermore, the loans by New York member banks to brokers were cut down from $1,516,049,000 on January 2 to $1,116,000,000 on February 6, a substantial reduction of $400,049,000. However, within the same period, according to the New York Federal Reserve Bank's weekly statement, loans to brokers for the account of others rose from $2,166,066,000 on January 2 to $2,612,000,000 on February 6, an increase of $445,934,000. Thus it is plain that despite the restriction in reserve credit loans for speculative purposes were augmented from outside sources. As a result of the tightening of Federal reserve credit, call-loan rates, after easing in the last week of January, showed a gradual and, with minor exceptions, a steady increase until the end of March, when the average renewal rate for the week ended March 30 stood at 12.75 per cent. In addition, buying rates on 60 to 90 day acceptances were raised from 5 per cent to 5⅛ per cent.

EVENTS BETWEEN FEBRUARY 6 AND MARCH 30

Shortly after the Federal Reserve Board's warning of February 6 the Senate adopted a resolution requesting the board to give it any information and suggestions which might be helpful in securing legislation to correct the evil complained of. This suggestion was not acted upon by the Federal Reserve Board, inasmuch as on February 27 it expressed confidence in its own powers to meet the demands of the situation without outside assistance—an assertion warranted by the fact that total brokers' loans reported by the Federal reserve banks of New York declined from $5,669,000,000 on February 6 to $5,477,000,000 on February 20, although an increase to $5,507,000,000 occurred on February 27. Furthermore, on February 6 loans to brokers for the New York reserve banks for their own account stood at $1,116,000,000, but dropped to $1,090,000,000 on the 27th day of February, while the system's buying of bills declined from $410,742,000 for the week ended February 6 to $334,075,000 for the week ended February 27, purchases of Governments decreased from $200,089,000 on the former date to $166,400,000 on the latter, and holdings of the latter declined from $75,592,000 to $43,500,000 on February 27. In addition, the stock market had been weak from the 6th of February to the 16th of February, when a rising trend in values began, reaching a peak about the 1st of March and culminating with a sharp decline on the 26th of March.

The next events of importance occurred at the end of March, when extreme stringency in the money market developed because of a substantial increase in brokers' loans to $5,649,000,000 on March 27, according to the statement of the Federal reserve banks of New York, or to $6,804,000,000 on March 31, as reported by New York Stock Exchange, and the necessity of preparing for interest and dividend payments of about $500,000,000 on April 1. As a result of these factors, and due to nervousness over the possibility of higher discount rates, the stock market collapsed on Tuesday, March 26, and the call-loan rate touched 20 per cent. That the Federal reserve banks played no part in extending further loans to brokers, and thus encouraged further speculation, may be seen from the fact that such loans by the member banks in New York remained relatively stable and amounted to $1,071,000,000 on March 27, as compared with $1,090,000,000 on February 27, while holdings of Government securities revealed a slight decline during the period, and the purchase of bills and Governments in the open market was further curtailed. Contrary to expectations, no change in the discount rates at important centers was made during the last two weeks in March, and great pressure was brought to bear on the banks to force them from additional borrowing at the Federal reserve bank.

A summary of these data on the Federal reserve open-market policy, and a statement of weekly brokers' loans from reserve board reports, as well as the average weekly rate of call-money rates, follow.

I ask to have this table printed in the RECORD without reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

EVENTS BETWEEN MAY 17 AND AUGUST 9

Mr. KEAN. Further significant developments occurred about the middle and latter parts of May. Steadily following its policy of strict control of credit, the system continued to restrict its purchases of bills and Government securities. For the week ended April 3 bills bought totaled $174,703,000, but for the week of May 22 about $137,980,000 were purchased, while the United States Government's purchase dropped from $169,058,000 to $153,287,000 on the respective dates. Within the same period loans to brokers by New York member banks were cut from $1,021,000,000 to $827,000,000, or $194,000,000, and total brokers' loans, as reported by the reserve banks on May 22 were about $42,000,000 below those on April 3, after having shown a sizable decline of about $137,000,000 in the interim. Money rates remained in general firm, buying rates for acceptances having ruled at 5½ per cent and the average weekly renewal rates for call loans mounted from 7.90 per cent for the week of April 20 to 12.40 per cent for the week of May 11, later declining to 6.60 per cent for the week closed May 25.

Despite these measures and their results, the stock markets had shown more strength than weakness, and during the middle of the first week in May attained about the best levels of the year to that time. As an expression of growing concern over the continued rise in speculative sentiment, on Friday, May 17, it was reported that the reserve banks at Chicago and New York applied for permission to raise their discount rates above 5 per cent, a request which was not granted by the board. Four days later the Federal Reserve Advisory Council likewise recommended the granting of such requests, but again the Federal Reserve Board took no action. However, apprehension of the possibility of an increase in the discount rates led to a severe reaction in the stock markets, and prices followed a downward trend to the end of May.

At this point the reserve board may be criticized, in the light of later events, for not having granted the requests of the Chicago and New York banks and the recommendation of the advisory council, thus emphasizing more clearly to the general public its serious and unquestioned intention to curb speculation. The plain facts are that the Federal reserve system had employed to this end every available and drastic means in its power; and while the reserve board and banks realized the need for further strong remedies, their policy had of necessity to be shaped not only by the growing emergency arising from excessive speculation but also by the requirements for reasonable credit on the part of commerce and trade, which, up to that time, had continued to flourish even under the disadvantage of already high costs of money.

Statistics on the operations of the Federal reserve system during the period under discussion, and the course of average weekly renewal rates for call money, are presented in the table following.

I ask that this table may be printed without reading.

Mr. KEAN. The interval from the 1st of June to August 9, when the New York reserve banks' discount rate was raised from 5 per cent to 6 per cent, was characterized by rising values for stocks, mounting loans to brokers by the New York member banks and for the account of other banking lenders, and firm rates for call loans and bankers' acceptances. Again, however, the reserve system contributed nothing to encourage speculative sentiment. Significant features of the operations of the member banks at New York within the period under review were that their loans to brokers, after falling to $773,000,000 on May 29, showed gradual increases of $1,205,000,000 on July 31, or a growth of $432,000,000, due principally to the large volume of rights issued to holders of securities, which were financed mainly by banks, and not to a direct absorption of banking funds for speculative purposes. Loans to brokers for the account of others rose from $2,975,000,000 on the former date to $3,058,000,000 on the latter date, or $83,000,000. The tremendous increase of borrowing for speculation is very forcibly illustrated by the growth in brokers' loans shown by the New York Stock Exchange reports, which revealed a rise from $6,665,000,000 at the end of May to $7,474,000,000 on July 31, an increase of $809,000,000, which played an important part in the decision of the reserve board to allow the increase in the discount rate at New York. Endeavors of the reserve banks to constrict still further the use of its credit resulted in a decline in the system's buying of bills from $117,979,000 for the week of May 29 to $65,956,000 for the week of July 10, after which there was an increase to $74,567,000 for the seven days ending with the 31st of July. For the week of May 29, governments bought stood at $144,572,000, and $147,283,000 for the week of July 31, having receded to $136,144,000 for the period of July 10. Meanwhile, governments held in the special investment account totaled $20,500,000 on May 29 and dropped to $17,500,000 on July 31. Reflecting these changes, the average weekly renewal rates on call loans remained firm, having touched a low of 6 per cent for the week of June 1 and a high of 11 per cent for the week ended July 6. The buying rate on bankers' acceptances held at 5½ per cent until July 12, when it was reduced by one-fourth of 1 per cent to 5¼ per cent.

An abstract of the foregoing data is as follows:

EVENTS BETWEEN AUGUST 10 AND OCTOBER 29

Following the announcement of the new discount rate of 6 per cent at New York, stock prices reacted for a short time, then regained their losses, and continued upward until September 7, when the standard statistics index for 90 stocks attained the highest levels for the year, after which the trend of values fluctuated uncertainly, but with a downward movement, until the crash on October 29.

Coincident with this action on the discount rate of the New York bank, the Reserve Board lowered the buying rate for bankers' acceptances from 5¼ per cent to 4⅛ per cent in an effort to offset an unfavorable reaction on business which had revealed a definite slackening tendency about the turn of the half year. With the exception of an emergency expansion in reserve credit after the stock market crash on the 29th of October, any growth in reserve bank credit from this time onward until the end of the year should be regarded as being the result of an increased demand therefor on the part of legitimate business. No deviation in its policy of diverting its own credit from the stock market was allowed by the reserve banks. For example, from August 14 to October 23 loans to brokers by the member banks in New York showed an actual increase of about $112,000,000 to $1,077,000,000 on the latter date, but brokers' loans for the account of others rose by the substantial sum of $645,000,000 to $3,823,000,000. Brokers' loans, as reported by the New York Stock Exchange, revealed an increase of $667,000,000 from August 31 to September 30.

A direct comparison with the reserve bank figures is not possible on account of the fact that the New York Stock Exchange includes in its tabulation of brokers' loans nonmember bank and foreign loans. Bills bought by the reserve banks during the week of August 14 amounted to $117,885,000, and increased to $379,383,000 for the week of October 23, an increase of $261,448,000. Evidence that this increment was to a large extent seasonal and occasioned by the requirements of trade may be seen from the fact that in the corresponding period of 1927 an increase of $102,000,000 was revealed and in 1928 about $205,000,000. In addition lower rates on bills influenced holders to sell to the reserve banks, thus helping to swell further the amounts bought by the system. However, purchases of Government securities decreased from $154,303,000 to $135,704,000, or $18,599,000, on the respective dates. Furthermore, Government securities held at the end of the week of August 14 amounted to $31,125,000, but declined to $22,500,000 on October 23, or $8,625,000. Throughout this period renewal rates for call loans showed great firmness until about the 12th of October, after which a gradual easing was noticeable.

Mr. President, I have tried to show the history of the Federal reserve banks from 1927 up to and after the panic. I have shown, I think, that as to the country banks, since 1927 they have not been able to obtain bills that were open to rediscount by the Federal reserve banks, and this bill broadens to a small extent the basis on which the country banks can get securities which will enable them to build up their secondary reserve. When they get that built up, then they will be able to accommodate their customers in other lines.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will state the first amendment of the Committee on Banking and Currency.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. The committee proposes, on page 2, line 3, after the word "notes" and the comma, to strike out the word "the" and to insert the words "provided such banks have no adequate amounts of eligible and acceptable assets to obtain sufficient accommodation through rediscounting at the Federal reserve bank."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The legislative clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-three Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee.

Mr. FLETCHER. May we have the amendment stated again?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be again stated for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 2, line 3, the committee proposes to strike out the word "the" and to insert the words "provided such banks have no adequate amounts of eligible and acceptable assets to obtain sufficient accommodation through rediscounting at the Federal reserve banks. The," so as to read:

SEC. 10. (a) Upon receiving the consent of not less than six members of the Federal Reserve Board, any Federal reserve bank may make advances, in such amount as the board of directors of such Federal reserve bank may determine, to groups of five or more independently owned and controlled member banks within its district upon their time or demand promissory notes, provided such banks have no adequate amounts of eligible and acceptable assets to obtain sufficient accommodation through rediscounting at the Federal reserve bank. The liability of the individual—

And so forth.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, I do not understand that is the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT]. I understood that he offered a substitute for, or an amendment to, the committee amendment which should first be considered.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator from Connecticut sent to the desk a proposed substitute for that committee amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is it offered in behalf of the committee?

Mr. GLASS. No.

Mr. FLETCHER. I do not want to have the committee amendment considered before the substitute is placed before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut offers an amendment to the amendment proposed by the committee, which will be stated for the information of the Senate.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. In lieu of the matter proposed to be inserted by the committee on page 2, in lines 3 to 6, inclusive, insert the following: "provided the bank or banks which receive the proceeds of such advances as herein provided have no adequate amounts of eligible or acceptable assets available to enable such bank or banks to obtain sufficient credit accommodations from the Federal reserve bank through rediscounts or advances other than as provided in section 10 (b). The."

Mr. GLASS. I am authorized by the committee to accept the amendment.

Mr. KING. I would like to have the Senator from Virginia or the Senator from Connecticut explain the purpose of the amendment to the committee amendment.

Mr. GLASS. It simply clarifies the intent of the language placed in the bill by the committee. It does not permit any one bank in the group which has failed to use its eligible paper to receive advantage of the rediscounts.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut, accepted by the committee, to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. May the Chair announce that there are numerous amendments which have been printed and are lying on the table. They will not come up automatically, and the authors of the amendments should be on guard in order to offer the amendments.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will state it.

Mr. BLAINE. The amendments proposed by Members of the Senate will not come up until the committee amendments are disposed of?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is correct. The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 2, line 7, the committee proposes to strike out the word "to" and insert the word "must," so as to read:

The liability of the individual banks in each group must be limited to such proportion of the total amount advanced to such group as the deposit liability of the respective banks bear to the aggregate deposit liability of all banks in such group, but such advances may be made to a lesser number of such member banks if the aggregate amount of their deposit liability constitutes at least 10 per cent of the entire deposit liability of the member banks within such district.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 3 the committee proposes to strike out lines 7, 8, 9, and 10, in the following words:

National banking associations are authorized and empowered to indorse or guarantee notes of other member banks evidencing advances made pursuant to the provisions of this section.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

Member banks are authorized to obligate themselves in accordance with the provisions of this section.

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Virginia whether the committee has any proposition with reference to the provision on page 2, line 17, where the House changed the word "request" to "require"?

Mr. GLASS. I think that might be done in conference.

Mr. FLETCHER. I hope that the committee will not contest that amendment.

Mr. GLASS. It was merely a misprint. On page 2, line 17, the word "request" ought to be "require."

Mr. FLETCHER. I move that that amendment be made now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be made without objection, and the question is on the amendment proposed by the committee on page 3, lines 7 to 10, which has been stated.

Mr. FLETCHER. Has the committee considered, in line 22, page 2, adding the words "or discount" after the word "interest"? That was done in the House at the urgent request, as the hearings show, of the Governor of the Federal Reserve Board. It seems to me to improve the bill, if the committee will propose it.

Mr. GLASS. I suggest to the Senator that when the bill goes to conference those minor alterations may be considered.

Mr. FLETCHER. It is quite material, it seems to me. I shall offer that amendment when the appropriate time comes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee, on page 3, striking out lines 7 to 10, and inserting the words which have been read.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

The LEGISLATIVE CLERK. On page 3, line 18, after the word "bank," the committee proposes to insert "having a capital of $500,000 or less," so as to read:

SEC. 10. (b) For a period of not exceeding one year from the date of the approval of this act, and in exceptional and exigent circumstances, and when any member bank, having a capital of $500,000 or less, has no further eligible and acceptable assets available to enable it to obtain adequate credit accommodations through rediscounting at the Federal reserve bank or any other method provided by this act other than that provided by section 10 (a)—

And so forth.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, I move to amend the amendment of the committee by striking out "$500,000" and inserting in lieu thereof "$2,000,000."

Mr. GLASS. I accept the amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Delaware to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, I would like to have the Senator from Virginia explain the purpose of the amendment, though perhaps he made the explanation the other day. At any rate, I should like to ask the Senator the reason for the change. My understanding is that originally the proposition was to make the limitation $300,000; but the Senator from Virginia accepted, as I thought and understood, a compromise of $500,000, and now the proposal is to raise that to $2,000,000. Does the Senator's knowledge of this question enable him to enlighten some of us who do not have the information?

Mr. GLASS. The Senator from Virginia suggested $500,000, but upon further consultation and conference it was concluded that that would exclude a good many banks which ought to be comprehended in this provision of the bill, and we finally determined to make it $2,000,000.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, as I understand it, this is to define a country bank to be any bank that has a capital of $2,000,000 or less.

Mr. GLASS. It comprises banks all the way from a minimum capital of $25,000 to $2,000,000.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. The object of it is, as I understand, to help the small banks and to prevent the larger banks from getting all the money. I understood the Senator from Virginia to say that he agreed to this very reluctantly. It seems to me that $500,000 is too large an amount if we want to give the smaller banks a chance. Now, if we are to increase it to $2,000,000, to my mind we might as well take off the limit. How many banks in the Federal reserve system, if the Senator can tell me, have a capital of $2,000,000 or more?

Mr. GLASS. There are 136 having a capital in excess of $2,000,000.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Arkansas?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. May I say to the Senator from Nebraska that within my own knowledge there are a number of banks in communities which are in a measure isolated that have in excess of $500,000 capital? I know of two or three that have, say, $600,000 or $750,000 capital. Any limitation that is made is, of course, more or less arbitrary.

Mr. NORRIS. I realize that it must be arbitrary.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. NORRIS. Certainly.

Mr. GLASS. I endeavored to state the situation the other day. It is briefly to the effect that there are a great many banks of larger capital than $500,000 so detached from the larger communities as that it would make it extremely inconvenient and in some instances literally impossible for them to avail themselves of this group provision of the bill, either to organize or get into a group. This alteration was intended to meet that situation.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, assuming that to be true, we still have a limitation on the so-called country banks of $2,000,000 capital or less. Most of the country banks I know of would have to borrow a whole lot of money from the Federal Government to increase their capital in order to come up to the maximum amount at least. But laying that aside, in the one case the right to get this money or to apply for it lasts only one year, while the other is indefinite as to the time. If we take off the limit entirely, then it seems to me there is no earthly use whatever for section 2 of the bill.

Mr. GLASS. The first section of the bill relating to group banks was embodied in the so-called Glass bill, which is intended to be a permanent measure, and therefore there is no limitation upon that section. The reason for that is that we are proposing in the so-called Glass bill to adopt a measure that will effectively avert a repetition, as we think, of this dreadful state of depression and financial disturbance.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not attempting to controvert the proposition, but it does seem to me if there is reason for making the provision permanent, especially when we raise the limit this way, that the proposition of limiting it to one year should be made permanent, as is done in section 3. But why not take that limitation off?

Mr. GLASS. I think it would be a very dangerous thing to do.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, if we ought to have a limitation on banks of $2,000,000 capital it ought to be limited to a year.

Mr. GLASS. It is.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand. If that is necessary, then it seems to me it would logically follow that the same reasons which would impel that kind of limitation upon banks of $2,000,000 capital or less would apply with equal force to all banks in the system. I can not understand the logic of limiting it to one class of banks and leaving it unlimited as to time as to another class of banks.

Mr. GLASS. Because this is supposed to be an emergency measure.

Mr. NORRIS. All right.

Mr. GLASS. But the first section of it embodied in the so-called Glass bill is intended to be a permanent law.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. COUZENS. The point the Senator makes seems to overlook the fact that under the first provision of the bill the banks must group themselves. The limitation is only applied where an individual bank makes application for a loan.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; but the excuse given for putting it in here at all is that these banks are located where they can not group themselves with other banks, and therefore we let them come in.

Mr. COUZENS. That is true.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well. If that is the reason for it, it will apply the year after next just as well as it applies now. If we permit the banks that are so situated that they can form themselves into groups to come in, and it is desired to help the banks that are not so located that they can form groups and let them in because they are thus isolated, there is not any reason why we should impose a limitation of one year in one case and provide no limit in the other case.

Mr. COUZENS. The reason the Senator from Virginia offers for that—and I have discussed it with him—is that he wants to have enacted a permanent bill which will take care of this situation, and that this is only a temporary measure.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well. I am not finding fault with that in any way. Although not entirely convinced, I am assuming, for the purpose of the argument, that the provision in the first section is necessary and proper. Let us take that for granted. Then it may be said, "Here are some banks that can not take advantage of that provision because they are isolated and they can not group themselves together; therefore we will let them come in singly if they have a capital of $2,000,000 or less." I can not see any logical reason for limiting the capital at all, but assume again, for the purpose of the argument, that that is necessary and we put it in the bill because certain banks can not form a group, then why limit the provision of the bill as it affects them to one year, when, although the fundamental condition that applies to banks that can group themselves together is different entirely, they have the permanent right to proceed under the provisions of section 1?

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, the reasons were various, and I think each one satisfactory. In the first place, we propose to take care of individual banks in permanent legislation, carefully considered and better safeguarded than this provision. In the second place, this was urged as an emergency measure, to be quickly passed in order to meet an existing situation. It was not regarded as psychologically desirable or sound for Congress to assume that the present situation is going to extend over a longer period than one year.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well, Mr. President; if that be true, then why not limit section 1 as well as section 2? In other words, if the logic of the situation would seem to require a limitation under section 2 of one year in the case of individual banks that are so located that they can not group themselves, then it seems to me there ought to be a similar limitation in the case of banks that are better located and that can group themselves together. It is desired to put the banks to which section 2 applies, which can not otherwise come in on account of geographical location, on an equality with other banks, so we put them on an equality, but that equality only lasts one year, and then they lose the advantage, while all other banks which can group themselves may have the advantage indefinitely.

Mr. BARKLEY. Mr. President, will the Senator yield there?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I yield to the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. BARKLEY. Regardless of the size of the bank as measured by its capital stock, under the language of the bill in another place they can only take advantage of the provisions of this bill where they have no rediscountable paper. Under present conditions that would apply to only 91 banks in the United States, according to the statement of the Senator from Virginia. Of course, that is a flexible number; it may go up or it may go down as conditions improve or as they grow worse, which I hope they will not do; but if we are to assume that the condition of these banks as disclosed the other day by the able address of the Senator from Virginia should remain somewhat in the same proportion as it is at this time, regardless of the size of the banks, there would be approximately only a hundred banks which would take advantage of this provision and obtain this credit.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not care how many can take advantage of it. It may be right to give an advantage to some banks because they are located so that they can group themselves together, and to exclude some as to which nothing is said; but here it is proposed to relieve other banks that can not form groups, and the relief only extends for a year, while in the case of the group banks it is permanent law and extends indefinitely.

Mr. GLASS. I should say to the Senator that there are some of us who did not see any necessity for it at all. It is simply in the nature of a present assurance to these banks that if they use their eligible paper they may obtain what I do not think is a necessary accommodation, but which others do.

Mr. NORRIS. I think I agree with the Senator; it is probably unnecessary, and, as I look at it, the whole bill is unnecessary; but it seems to me we ought, if we are going to pass this bill, to build it on a perfectly logical basis, and, as I see it, and as I can reason it out, that has not been done.

Mr. GLASS. If the Senator please, he may offer an amendment to the first section of the bill and put a time limit there.

Mr. NORRIS. I realize I could offer an amendment, but I realize also that there is more psychology in the passing of this bill than there is in the bill itself, in my judgment, and that it is cut and dried, it is going through, and that no amendment that I might offer will cut any figure.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, if I may interrupt the Senator from Nebraska, following out the arguments that he used in reference to this section, why would it not cover the case to provide that where it is impossible for banks to group themselves together, where the geographical location and exigencies or the circumstances are such that they are not in a position to group themselves, without reference to their capital, they may be put in a class where they can benefit by this proposed legislation even though they can not take advantage of section 1?

Mr. GLASS. For the simple reason that there is not any member bank of the system in the United States with $2,000,000 of capital which is not in a position to use the bill.

Mr. SMITH. If a line can be drawn as to the amount of capital which would determine whether or not they were within the possibilities of grouping, then such a line ought to be drawn. If the committee is in possession of the knowledge that there are banks with as much as $2,000,000 of capital that are geographically located where they can not avail themselves of grouping, that is all right; but it does seem to me if we are putting it upon the basis that the bill will apply to those that can not group themselves, it would be proper to leave out any limitation as to the amount of capital and merely provide that those that can not avail themselves of the grouping privileges may take advantage of the other provision.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, it was the conclusion of the committee——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I think there is a good deal——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska has the floor.

Mr. NORRIS. That is what I thought, and that is the reason I was speaking, Mr. President.

I think there is a good deal of logic in the suggestion made by the Senator from South Carolina and, so far as I am able to see, I would not care about any limitation in there at all, either as to time or as to capitalization. Let it apply so as to meet the needs of those banks that are so situated geographically that they can not take advantage of the provision that permits them to group. That is, assuming all the time that the grouping provision is necessary, a thing that I myself have never understood, and I do not believe now that it is necessary, because when they group and get the money they are not jointly liable to the Federal reserve bank where they get the money.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Oh, yes, Mr. President; they are. I think the Senator is wrong about that.

Mr. NORRIS. I wonder if I am?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. They are liable both severally and jointly. There is a limitation on their liability to this effect——

Mr. NORRIS. Let me read the provision, Mr. President. I may be wrong about it, and I should be glad to be corrected if I am.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Before the Senator reads the provision, if I may add to the statement I made, the group arrangement provides for very much stronger paper to the Government than is to be expected under section 3, for the very reason that there is a joint and several liability where the banks avail themselves of the group arrangement. The only limitation on their liability is found commencing in line 6:

> The liability of the individual banks in each group must be limited to such proportion of the total amount advanced to such group as the deposit liability of the respective banks bears to the aggregate deposit liability of all banks in such group.

From that language there can be no doubt that there is a limited joint and several liability; and the assumption, of course, is when five banks sign a promissory note to secure an advance to one bank that the note is a better piece of paper than would be obtained by taking the note of a single bank that is in extremity. In other words, there is an element of accommodation contemplated in the group arrangement. It means cooperation; it may mean the clearing house, for instance, of a given city, will, in a measure, get behind a bank that is needing assistance.

I have in mind now a city in the United States, a comparatively small city, where what was generally regarded as the strongest and most solvent banking institution in the city was threatened with a run because of the failure of a large stockholder who resided in another city. That run continued. The clearing-house association at first issued a statement that the bank was perfectly solvent; that there was no danger to the depositors; but the run continued. The officers of the bank did not use the certificate of the clearing-house association; the clearing-house association withdrew it; the bank went into liquidation; and there was thus created a very distressing situation. If the other banks in that town had gotten behind and remained behind the bank in difficulty, there would have been, probably, no bank failures in the city and numerous related institutions would have continued their operations.

I did not mean to take so much of the Senator's time, and I thank him for being good enough to yield.

Mr. NORRIS. That is all right. Mr. President, if the liability of the group banks is joint and several, then the language certainly ought to be changed; we ought to say so; and it can be done in four or five words. Let me read what I started to read when the Senator from Arkansas interrupted me. He read a portion of the section which I was going to read:

> The liability of the individual banks in each group must be limited to such proportion of the total amount advanced to such group as the deposit liability of the respective banks bears to the aggregate deposit liability of all banks in such group, but such advances may be made to a lesser number of such member banks if the aggregate amount of their deposit liability constitutes at least 10 per cent of the entire deposit liability of the member banks within such district.

I suppose that means the Federal reserve district.

> Such banks shall be authorized to distribute the proceeds of such loans to such of their number and in such amount as they may agree upon, but before so doing they shall request such recipient banks to deposit with a suitable trustee, representing the entire group, their individual notes made in favor of the group protected by such collateral security as may be agreed upon.

And then it goes on and prescribes what rate of interest the Federal reserve bank shall charge, and so forth.

I think that is rather a complicated liability and does not mean what I understand the Senator from Arkansas thinks it means—that the liability to the Federal reserve bank of the group of banks is joint and several; I do not think it means that by any means.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator pardon me?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I am convinced that it does mean a joint and several liability, with the limitation that the liability is in proportion to the deposits that each bank has compared with the aggregate deposits.

Mr. NORRIS. That limits the liability of each one of the group.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. What that language means, as I construe it, is that if I sign the Senator's paper there is a limit on my liability. I agree to join in his note; but he can give me security against any loss that I might experience by reason of having joined in his obligation.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit an interruption——

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. GLASS. It seems to me the liability to the Federal reserve bank is the group liability. The liability of the group is the individual liability of the several banks in proportion to their deposits.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. That is right.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not believe the language means that. I do not know that we are doing any good by discussing this point; but it seems to me clearly that that is not what it means.

If the Senator has that in mind, then he ought to say:

The liability of the group banks shall be joint and several.

And that would end it all. But what does it say?—

The liability of the individual banks in each group must be limited to such proportion of the total amount advanced to such group—

And so forth. I take it that it is referring there, not to the liability to the group of one of the individuals of the group but to the liability to the Federal reserve bank. If we make this joint and several, I doubt very much whether we are not requiring something that would result in never saving a weak bank. The strong banks would unite and leave out the weak ones.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. It is my impression that this paper to be issued by the groups is in the nature of clearing-house certificates.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator spoke of clearing houses before. A clearing house, it seems to me, clearly would not be able to get any money as a clearing house.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. No.

Mr. NORRIS. Those same banks might unite into a group, it is true.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I concede that. I said "in the nature" of a clearing house.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. It is something in the nature of a clearing house, I think.

Mr. President, I have taken up more time than I wanted to take. I still think, regardless of how great the emergency may be, that if section 2 is based on good financial economic theories, then section 1 ought to have the limitation both as to time and as to banks taken out of it, or we ought to say that where a bank is so located that it is geographically impossible to group it with other banks it should be entitled to so-and-so.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I do not want to be mistaken in the interpretation that the Senator from Virginia has given, and I do not want to misunderstand what he has suggested respecting individual and independent banks. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Virginia whether or not there is any provision in the Glass bill—the bill designed to be permanent, substantive law—which contemplates advancements to independent or individual banks such as are provided for in section 2 of the bill now before us.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that the subcommittee had practically agreed upon the draft of some such provision in the Glass bill, but had not finished consideration of it. They had not embodied in the proposed provision entirely such safeguards as some members of the committee thought should be applied.

Mr. BLAINE. I thank the Senator. I could not find anything of the kind in the bill as it is offered by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. There was nothing except as to the first section.

Mr. BLAINE. The second section, that to which the Senator now makes reference, respecting independent banks, is just in incubation before a subcommittee of the Committee on Banking and Currency?

Mr. GLASS. That is true; and that particular provision would not have been in this bill except that this is an emergency measure, designed to take care of the alleged immediate necessities of some individual banks.

Mr. BLAINE. My observation on that proposition is that the bill before us proposes to write permanent, substantive law respecting the opportunity of group banking to obtain certain advances.

Mr. GLASS. That is a proposed permanent provision of the so-called Glass bill.

Mr. BLAINE. In the present bill?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. BLAINE. Then why not extend the same privileges to the independent or individual bank along the lines that the subcommittee expects to propose as a part of the original Glass bill?

Mr. GLASS. I have tried to indicate to the Senator that is what we have in contemplation and in prospect; but we were hurried into this emergency measure, and we put the limitation there accordingly in order to enable us in an orderly and deliberate way to frame such a provision; and, being an emergency measure, we did not want the Congress to be responsible for the psychology that would ensue from saying that this immediate necessity would be prolonged over a period of more than one year.

Mr. BLAINE. Of course, the purposes of the Senator from Virginia are very laudable.

Mr. GLASS. As a matter of fact, I may add that if we prepare a permanent bill, which is now before the Banking and Currency Committee under a special order, the subcommittee does not apprehend that there will ever be another necessity for legislation of this kind.

Mr. BLAINE. There is no doubt about the laudable purposes in the mind of the Senator from Virginia. I know that he has in a way been driven by force of circumstances, representations, and bed-time bear stories, and all that sort of thing into the position in which we now find ourselves; and I place no responsibility whatever upon the shoulders of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. The Senator from Virginia takes his part of the responsibility.

Mr. BLAINE. I think the Senator from Virginia has acted in a manner for which he need make no apology whatever; but if the Senate had the information and the knowledge that is now in the hands of the subcommittee of the Committee on Banking and Currency respecting their proposal to aid independent or individual banks, we might then, in this bill, treat those banks identically the same as we propose to treat group banking. The Senate, however, has not that information; and on account of the technicalities involved in all of the ramifications of banking, I do not know that any amendment can be proposed by any Senator that would extend indefinitely the permanency or the life of the proposal under section 2 with the proper restrictions that ought to be thrown about it.

Mr. GLASS. I think that is true, Mr. President; and, if attempted here, meanwhile some of these banks in a perilous situation may fail.

Mr. BLAINE. I have not any doubt but that some restrictions ought to be thrown about this proposal. The only restriction of any consequence in this bill is the 1-year limitation. If we would treat the group banks as it is proposed to treat the individual and independent banks we would limit the authority to one year and then legislate substantive law of a permanent character along the lines which have been proposed by the Senator from Virginia; and it would seem to me that that might to a large degree relieve the feeling, the fear of many of the independent and individual banks that may never hope to receive any protection or any aid under section 2 of this bill. I think the situation we are in is a very unfortunate one.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. FESS in the chair). Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BLAINE. I do.

Mr. KING. The Senator from Virginia made a statement a moment ago; and, if it does not disturb the Senator from Wisconsin, for information I should like to see whether I properly interpreted what he said.

I understood the Senator from Virginia to say that the bill which is now in process of construction would deal with certain provisions—notably, section 3—of this bill. I was wondering if the Senator's statement went far enough to create the impression, as it did in my mind, that the bill under consideration would also deal with section 1 of this bill.

Mr. GLASS. Section 1 is taken literally from the bill, from the previous attempt.

Mr. KING. I was wondering if there was any intention in that bill to reenact the provisions of section 1 here, or to broaden it or narrow it.

Mr. GLASS. We propose no particular alteration in it. That section of the bill was lifted literally from the permanent bill, with some modifications. The section as contained in the permanent bill had a progressive rate of interest, beginning at 1 per cent, in the rediscount rate for advances; and it has been so modified in this bill as to retain the initial 1 per cent and relegate the banks to the approval of the board for any increase in the rate that might thereafter be desired.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, the point I want to emphasize is this: That the pending measure is designed as a relief measure, the assumption being that there are certain emergencies existing respecting banking or the failure of certain banks to function. I need not go into the reason.

By reason of their geographical convenience or commercial convenience in the transaction of business in certain areas, it is advantageous for certain banks to join into groups to obtain the benefits under section 1 of the pending measure. We have no assurance whatever that after those groups have succeeded in protecting themselves permanently and indefinitely the same rights are to be conferred upon the independent and individual banks which may be in the most urgent need in any permanent legislation enacted at this session of the Congress.

I do not impute to anyone any motive. I do not think any Member of the Senate is responsible for it. I am sure the Senator from Virginia has stated over and over again his views concerning the matter, but with this pending measure those banks which will have the opportunity to organize in groups resort to a sort of trick in legislation to obtain those benefits, and that is what this amounts to.

I did not intend to discuss the bill, as I want to discuss an amendment which I shall propose when the proper time comes, but while I am on my feet I want to make the observation that I do not know whether we are doing good or harm in the manner in which these emergency measures have been handled. There is a strange situation prevailing in Washington, and that which is occurring here is, of course, flashed over the wires, published in the daily press in every section of the country, and I express now the thought that if I were 2,000 miles away from Washington and had followed the news coming from Washington I would hesitate a long time, if I had any funds, before depositing those funds in any bank.

We hear talk about individuals hoarding money, and there is a great campaign now in progress—I do not know how great it is, but it is described as a great campaign by those who are promoting it—to drag from the teakettles, out of the mattresses, and out of the safety-deposit vaults money that is alleged to be hoarded. While that campaign is going on, if it is of any consequence at all, it is being neutralized by the actions which have been taken by the administration in promulgating and promoting these so-called emergency relief measures.

We can lack all imagination, and get down to the realities, and what sort of demonstrations have we had? Unfortunately, it is quite impossible to debate these emergency measures from the standpoint of facts, because there are no facts of record that have been disclosed to the Congress, or that have been disclosed to the public. Therefore I think Members of the Congress and citizens of the United States have a right to indulge certain conjectures. That right arises from the conduct of those who are in the responsible positions respecting our banking and other financial institutions, and the direction of those institutions. If ever there was a design to create fear, it could have been accomplished in no better way than that which has been followed here in Washington, and arising in the executive departments of our Government.

That is the situation in which we find ourselves, and what does Mr. Ordinary Citizen think about it? How is he influenced by it? If Mr. Ordinary Citizen has followed the press reports, he will entertain a belief, and honestly so, because he has not been given the facts, that our whole financial structure in this country is nothing but a shell. All the information that has gone out to the country would lead to no other conclusion in the mind of the ordinary citizen. Then he is to be condemned and pilloried and abused and denounced as unpatriotic and disloyal when he undertakes, in the face of this information or lack of information, to call to his help a law that is higher than any statutory law, the law of self-preservation, and in self-preservation those who have saved a few hundred or a few thousand dollars to serve them in acquiring the necessities of life during the twilight of their existence upon this earth are perfectly justified in laying away in secure places that which will provide for their wants when they are no longer able, through their mental or physical efforts, to acquire a competency.

Citizens of a government have a right to protect themselves against want and privation and the poorhouse, and I would have little respect for the man who lacked the red blood, the ability, and the demand to conserve his savings in the present circumstances.

That is the attitude of Mr. Ordinary Citizen. The whole atmosphere emanating from the executive department is to the effect that " the gobble-uns'll git you ef you don't watch out."

So that Congress is to be turned into a nursery. The people are to be told bedtime stories, be given some bear tales. The Congress is deluged with nursery rhymes, when the lights are turned low, to put the Congress to fright and in fear. It takes a strong man, under those circumstances and under that psychology, to refrain from whistling as he passed by graveyards.

It is not even sufficient on the part of the executive departments—and I include in those executive departments the responsible Cabinet officers—to parade before the Congress and the citizens of this country the most exaggerated tales but also to create imaginary antediluvian ichthyosauria. It is stated as a fact that some terrible, hairy-breasted, horned biped of some character, with teeth like tusks, is proceeding out of the deep sea.

It was just the other day that the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. WALCOTT] dragged one of these animals up to the sandy shores of that narrow strip of land of his State which touches the Atlantic Ocean, dragged that ugly, horrible thing across the swamps and through the mires and cranberry marshes, dragged it into the Senate of the United States, where the Senator became an instructor in Grecian mythology. But I do not blame the Senator from Connecticut. The psychology of the executive department was transmitted to the Senator, and so he attributed the existence of the present emergency to the mythical god Pan. He described him as an ugly creature.

Mr. President, I digress for just a moment. Pan! Not Peter Pan, but Pan! In my boyhood days I understood that Pan wandered through the forests. Pan was the patron of husbandry, of all good fishermen, of all huntsmen.

The Senator from Connecticut shattered the Pan pipes, those fragile reeds that every boy who has had the opportunity to which he is entitled, created out of this romping, roaming, mischievous god of the forest, this hairy, horned, ugly thing Pan, that he might attribute to it this psychology of fear which had been nurtured and fed out of the front door of the White House and other executive departments. I am not concerned about this after nearly 50 years have passed, since for me Pan roamed the forests, but I am concerned with the downright silliness and foolishness of appealing to these ancient mythical gods that the Congress and the people of the United States may be filled with fear.

We passed the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act. Its whole and almost single support is upon the basis of fear. It was going to drive back into the sea this ugly, horned, hairy-breasted miserable Grecian god.

A few weeks went on and "Hell 'n' Maria" came to Washington. He went before the Committee on Banking and Currency of the House of Representatives. If we are to believe stories that came out of that room—and we have a perfect right to believe them in the absence of disclosure through a record of the hearings—"Hell 'n' Maria" beat the table and tore to shreds and pieces the stenographic notes. Not being satisfied to cast them into the waste-basket, he promptly submerged them in a spittoon. I do not mean to be facetious, Mr. President, I mean to be realistic. Terrible things were going to happen. Some bank was in distress. I do not know whether it was his bank or not, but you have a right to draw any implication you may desire from that comment of mine. Some other bank or banks were in distress. The $2,000,000,000 of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation was only a drop in the bucket and, therefore, could not come to the rescue of those financial institutions.

This psychology was spread all over the country. The press representatives did the best they could. They could report only the facts that were disclosed. Do not blame the newspapers for suppressing the facts. Blame those in responsible positions for their failure to disclose the facts. If we are in the situation that those in responsible positions have described, my own opinion is that the people of the country, if they knew the facts, have a broad vision, a deep patriotism, and a high composite intelligence which enable them to give their hands and their minds to the solution of these problems. They are quite willing, if they are given the opportunity, to cooperate with those in high places and in authority who are presumed to represent intelligence, and yet those in authority must create a mystery.

Creating that mystery, they create a psychology. Every conjecture becomes a fact, every rumor finds its justification in fact. Thus we find a lack of confidence on the part of the people in the ability of our bankers to control their affairs or the financial affairs of this country. So, in order to perpetuate and to heighten that same psychology of fear, to increase that lack of confidence in our banking and financial institutions, the same individuals in the executive departments come to Congress with another funeral, but with the same diligence, with the same persistency, they decline to let Congress or the people in on anything except their bedtime stories and their bear stories, their ugly Grecian gods, their mysteries, and the rumors they spread. I presume when we shall have concluded with this bill and a few weeks elapse the next exhibit to be placed before the Congress and the people will be Pandora and her box.

I say, Mr. President, and I say advisedly, that the methods that have been used in promoting these so-called relief measures, the vagueness of the stories that have come out of the executive departments, the dragging out of ancient imaginative creatures have had the tendency to produce and have produced the psychology of fear. Whatever psychology of fear is abroad in the land to-day can be traced to those who have had in their keeping the direction and the protection of our fiscal banking and financial institutions. In view of that conduct and all the circumstances I have described I say advisedly that Mr. Ordinary Citizen has the right to put his life savings where he may deem them safe.

Mr. President, the most exaggerated statements have been made, statements that have been woven into yarns, statements that have grown out of circumstances either misunderstood or deliberately misrepresented, until to-day the security of the American citizen lies in the protection of that citizen by himself.

What are some of those exaggerations? Mr. Ordinary Citizen has been accused of hoarding money, and when they pronounce or breathe the word "hoarding" they impute almost a criminal act. I assert, however, sir, that if there has been any appreciable hoarding it finds for its justification the conduct of those in the administration of our affairs. Mr. Ordinary Citizens has been accused of hoarding various sums, the amount depending upon the deluded brain of the individual who states the amount—a billion dollars, a billion and a quarter, a billion and a half. Mr. President, Mr. Ordinary Citizen has a perfect right to have some money in hand; he has a perfect right to have some money in pocket. If we are to believe the stories that have come out of the executive departments that money will find circulation far more rapidly than if it had been deposited in banks.

Not being satisfied with the nursery rhymes, the bed-time stories, the ancient tales of mythology, not being satisfied with exaggeration and the unjustifiable charges made against the citizenry of our country, not being satisfied with all those methods to produce fear, the Administration now undertakes to advise individual Senators of another bogy man. So they bring out this last power of destruction, the deposits of foreign gold and foreign credit in our banks. They parade before us the threat that France is going to make a raid upon our gold reserve, and therefore we must release hypothecated gold in the Federal reserve banks to meet the expected withdrawals, but the ultimate result will be that those banks may issue against that gold additional Federal reserve notes backed by 40 per cent gold and 60 per cent Federal obligations, or increase loans to member banks and offer this freed gold as reserve.

They undertake to scare and frighten the Congress and the people into the enactment of a measure that provides that at least 60 per cent of the currency to be issued under the last section of the pending bill shall have no other standing, no other backing, than would scrip or greenbacks or printed money. It is admitted that that is the fact to the extent of 60 per cent. Then our Government and our people are called upon to pay upon those Government obligations, those Government bonds, as high as 4¼ per cent interest per annum. So the American people will pay 4¼ per cent interest on 60 per cent of the volume of the currency issues provided by this bill for the privilege of granting to the Federal reserve banks the right to issue 100 cents on the dollar and pass it on to member banks who will receive interest all the way from 6 to 20 per cent in the turnover of that currency—interest coming from commercial and industrial interests and interest coming from the call market! But should the freed gold be used as a reserve back of Federal reserve credit extended member banks under the preceding sections of this bill, those member banks as a system can multiply those loans and interest sums by tenfold.

Why, Mr. President, every single dollar of expansion in credit provided by the first two sections of this bill is potentially credit for the stock exchanges—every dollar of it. There is no protection thrown about the issue of that money or thrown about the extension of that credit; not a single line that affords any guaranty whatever but that every dollar of the expanded credit will find its way into the stock exchanges.

Mr. President, the demonstrations in the last few days ought to be convincing to us that those who desire to gamble in stocks and bonds are reacting to the possibilities of additional billions of dollars in credit, that it may be used to inflate securities offered for sale through the stock exchanges. That means the beginning of another period of inflation in stocks and bonds. It seems to me we have had sufficient and most painful experiences in the last few years to cause us to hesitate and to consider that there is a duty somewhere to protect the people of the United States against another debacle in stocks and bonds; and yet there is not a single line, there is not a single word, looking to the protection of the interests of the people of this country—not one word or line. Not only is that true in the extension of credit, but in the expansion of the currency as well it is demanded of our Government that we pay the bankers as high as 4¼ per cent for the privilege of permitting the bankers to extend their bank issues, all of which, so far as this bill is concerned, can find its way into the inflation of stocks and bonds once again upon the stock market; and then we are assured that that is the beginning of the return of prosperity! Prosperity for whom? For the same men, the same bankers, who to a large extent are responsible for the present crisis.

Mr. President, I can not go along with a proposition of that kind. For that reason I shall propose an amendment designed to prevent the use of credit extended under this bill in the stock markets of the United States. In drafting that measure, I have practically lifted the language out of the Glass bill, which is still before the Committee on Banking and Currency. That bill may never pass this Congress. That bill may be so mutilated and made ineffective that it ought not to pass this Congress.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. Will the Senator permit me at least to assure him that it will pass if I can induce Congress to pass it. Congress will have an opportunity to pass it.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, there is no doubt about the intention of the able Senator from Virginia. I know the determination he has to bring out that bill and to pass it before this session adjourns; but he knows, and I know that there are certain powerful influences in this country which propose to mutilate and destroy the purposes designed by the Senator from Virginia. I do not want to trust to the future on this proposition. Under this bill there is a possibility of an expansion of credit and an expansion of currency running into the billions of dollars. The mouths of the operators on the stock exchanges are watering. They see here a great, large, fully matured melon. They see here a well with an inexhaustible supply from which can be pumped additional credits and additional currency so that they may again reach the point of October, 1929, and America again reach a worse crisis than we now have upon us.

So, Mr. President, the time to lock the door is now. It may be too late. I can not be optimistic enough to conceive that this protection ever will be written into a law designed as an amendment to the present reserve system, and as substantive law. Write into this bill the protective measure designed by the Glass bill, and we will then at least have some security that whatever expansion of credit may come out of this bill will go into the avenues of productive industry and commerce and agriculture; and, whatever expanded currency comes from this bill, that it also will go into productive industry, commerce, and agriculture. With that protection thrown about this bill I can sacrifice some of my scruples, some of my principles, and support the bill as a temporary measure.

I can follow the Senator from Virginia and assert my position in the language used by him on the floor last Wednesday. But without this protection, without a guaranty that this bill is something more than in the interest of stock jobbers, something more than in the interest of those who want to gamble with the very life of our banking and financial institutions, I can not give it my support.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee. The Chair understands the committee to have accepted the modification proposed by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. TOWNSEND]. The question is therefore on the amendment as modified.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The clerk will call the roll.

The Chief Clerk called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Copeland	Johnson	Robinson, Ind.
Austin	Costigan	Jones	Schall
Bailey	Couzens	Kean	Sheppard
Bankhead	Cutting	Keyes	Shipstead
Barbour	Dale	King	Smith
Barkley	Davis	Logan	Smoot
Bingham	Dickinson	McGill	Steiwer
Black	Dill	McKellar	Stephens
Blaine	Fess	McNary	Thomas, Idaho
Borah	Fletcher	Metcalf	Thomas, Okla.
Bratton	Frazier	Morrison	Townsend
Brookhart	George	Moses	Trammell
Broussard	Glass	Neely	Tydings
Bulkley	Goldsborough	Norbeck	Vandenberg
Bulow	Gore	Norris	Wagner
Byrnes	Hale	Nye	Walcott
Capper	Harrison	Oddie	Walsh, Mass.
Caraway	Hatfield	Patterson	Watson
Carey	Hawes	Pittman	Wheeler
Connally	Hayden	Reed	White
Coolidge	Hull	Robinson, Ark.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Eighty-three Senators having answered to their names, a quorum is present. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee as modified.

Mr. GEORGE. Let the amendment be stated.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated for the information of the committee.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 3, line 18, after the word "bank" and the comma, the committee proposes to insert the words "having a capital of $2,000,000 or less," so that it will read:

> For a period of not exceeding one year from the date of the approval of this act, and in exceptional and exigent circumstances, and when any member bank, having a capital of $2,000,000 or less, has no further eligible and acceptable assets available—

And so forth.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was, on page 3, line 25, after the word "board," to strike out the words "holding office at the time."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was, on page 5, line 11, after the word "members," to strike out the words "holding office at the time."

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That completes the committee amendments. The bill is open to amendment.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, without consultation with my colleagues of the committee, I want to suggest an amendment for clarification, on page 1, beginning with line 8, and extending to line 2 on page 2, where it provides that "any Federal reserve bank may make advances, in such amount as the board of directors of such Federal reserve bank may determine, to groups of five or more independently owned and controlled member banks within its district."

The purpose of that provision was to prevent holding companies from forming exclusive groups of their own members. Therefore, I take occasion to suggest this amendment, to strike out the words "independently owned and controlled" where they occur, and in line 2, page 2, after the words "member banks," to insert the words "a majority of them independently owned and controlled."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, on page 3, line 15, where we limit the operation of the provision to one year, it has been suggested that the words "one year from the date of the approval of this act" may have reference to the Federal reserve act, when it is really intended to refer only to this emergency measure. Therefore I move to strike out the words "For a period of not exceeding one year from the date of the approval of this act" and make it specific by saying "until March 3, 1933."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, pursuing the same purpose, on page 5, beginning with line 7 and extending down to line 9, where it says, "That, at any time within 12 months from the date of the approval of this act," I move to strike out the words "at any time within 12 months from the date of the approval of this act" and insert the words "until March 3, 1933," so that it will read, "That, until March 3, 1933," and so forth.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, will the Senator from Virginia permit a question?

Mr. GLASS. Certainly.

Mr. REED. I am familiar with the amendment which has already been adopted on page 2, line 3. As I recall, it reads, "provided such banks have no adequate amounts of eligible and acceptable assets." It occurs to me that there may be some doubt as to the construction of those words. As a matter of fact all five banks in the group first receive the proceeds, and then they turn the proceeds over to certain banks called recipient banks, after they get them.

Mr. GLASS. Under certain restrictions, certain limitations.

Mr. REED. Certainly, with collateral, and all that. I am sure I agree with the intention of the Senator in the amendment which has been agreed to, but it occurs to me that the words "the banks which receive the proceeds" might be held to mean the five banks and not the recipient banks, which are the recipients in the second process of distribution.

I believe the intent might be made a little more clear if we were to strike out the words "the banks which receive the proceeds" and insert the words "the recipient banks hereinafter mentioned." They are called "recipient banks" later on in the section.

Mr. GLASS. I perhaps would share the Senator's apprehension that there may be that interpretation of those words, but I would say for his benefit that we intrusted to the Treasury experts the matter of making that alteration. It was made in that precise language and I think it covers the case.

Mr. REED. Very good. I grant they are experts on Treasury matters, but they might not be experts in the use of language.

Mr. GLASS. I find that nobody is when it gets into the hands of lawyers. [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. Of course newspaper publishers are much more practiced in the use of language.

Mr. GLASS. I modestly admit that! [Laughter.]

Mr. REED. They use so much more of it that they ought to be very much better skilled in it. In any event no harm will have been done by the exchange of views and it is possible if that doubt ever arose it would be interesting to have the expressed view of the Senator from Virginia that what is meant in the amendment is the "recipient banks" mentioned later on in the section.

Mr. GLASS. That is precisely what the Senator has stated, and I will say to the Senator that in conference we will take up his suggestion in order that it may be more deliberately considered.

Mr. REED. I do not think the Senator can do so because I understand the language of the House bill is the same.

Mr. GLASS. Oh, no!

Mr. REED. In that case then it will be in conference.

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I desire to suggest an amendment to overcome an ambiguity. I presume the Senator from Virginia will make the same comment respecting what I shall propose as he did respecting what the Senator from Pennsylvania proposed. On page 5 I think there is an obvious ambiguity in language. Possibly the Treasury experts drafted the matter from the standpoint of the Treasury Department, but from the standpoint of clear language I have grave doubts about it.

I invite the attention of the Senator to the fact that in copying the paragraph of section 16 of the Federal reserve act, that paragraph is copied beginning on page 4 and down to the word "certificate" on page 5, line 7, exactly as it is in the present law. Then the proviso is made which is a new proviso. In that new proviso in line 13, the Senator will observe the words "as such collateral security." Evidently the antecedent of "as such collateral security" is the collateral security now provided by law; but when we come to line 19 the language is "such collateral security." That "collateral security" has as its antecedent "obligations of the United States." Therein lies the ambiguity. I would suggest that after the word "security" in line 19, page 5, we use the same language as is now used in the Federal reserve act, namely, "whether gold, gold certificates, or eligible paper." That will remove the ambiguity.

Mr. GLASS. I confess myself unable to see any ambiguity in the matter. The word "collateral" has been so variously and broadly interpreted that we used the word "security," at least the Treasury experts did, and it seems to me it covers the case completely.

Mr. BLAINE. It seems to me there is an obvious ambiguity in that the language refers to the antecedent "such obligations of the United States." It has no reference to the security that is mentioned in section 16.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly.

Mr. BORAH. What I am to understand the Senator to claim is referred to by the words "collateral security" in line 13? What is the antecedent of those words?

Mr. BLAINE. That refers to "collateral security" as now provided by law, "whether gold, gold certificates, or eligible paper."

Mr. GLASS. That is security put up with the Federal reserve agents for the notes applied for.

Mr. BLAINE. In line 13 the words "collateral security" refer to the language of the present law.

Mr. GLASS. This refers to language in the present law and, in addition to that, it refers to United States securities the use of which we are now proposing.

Mr. BLAINE. Perhaps I can make myself clear in this way. After copying the present law there is then sandwiched in a proviso, and following that proviso is a limitation of one year. Then it must have occurred to whoever drafted the law that there must be some restriction, and so he took the language of the present law, reading as follows:

> In no event shall such collateral security be less than the amount of the Federal reserve notes applied for.

Mr. GLASS. That comprehends all of the collateral security behind the Federal reserve notes, whether it be the provisions of section 16, whether it be gold or gold certificates, or whether it be United States obligations which we are now proposing to authorize.

Mr. BLAINE. I think the ambiguity is obvious, and if I am correct then we will require not only the 40 per cent gold, but the 100 per cent collateral security, making 140 per cent back of the Federal reserve notes. Of course, I have no objection to that.

Mr. GLASS. I could wish that that might be, but I do not think it will be.

Mr. BLAINE. I have no objection to it, and I was merely suggesting to take out of the language that which is, in my opinion, obviously ambiguous.

Mr. GLASS. I do not think the Federal Reserve Board or banks would so interpret the language as to require 140 per cent reserve. They would be glad to interpret it to mean simply 40 per cent.

Mr. BLAINE. Of course I appreciate the Federal Reserve Board has the decision in this matter and that the court would not decide it. But I think in the interest of clarity of language the reference to securities should include the words "whether gold, gold certificates, or eligible paper," because that is what we mean. I think the present language extremely awkward and obviously ambiguous. I have no interest in it especially, and if the Senator does not care to adopt my suggestion, I am willing to drop it. I did not, with my understanding of the matter, want to let it go by without calling attention to it.

Mr. GLASS. Frankly, I do not think it necessary, and still, with the utmost frankness, I do not feel myself able to contest legal refinements with the Senator from Wisconsin or any other Senator who is a lawyer. However, I do not think there is any necessity for the change.

Mr. BLAINE. If the Senator is perfectly satisfied with the present language, I have no desire to amend it. I thought I had a duty to suggest the ambiguity which to me appears here.

Mr. GLASS. I thank the Senator for his suggestion.

Mr. COUZENS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. BLAINE. Certainly.

Mr. COUZENS. I draw the attention of the Senator from Virginia to the word "such" in line 13. I think what the Senator from Wisconsin was driving at would be cured by striking out the word "such." It would then refer back to both groups of collateral.

Mr. GLASS. That may be. I have no objection to striking out the word "such."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. May the Chair understand the parliamentary situation? Does the Senator from Wisconsin withdraw the amendment which he previously proposed?

Mr. BLAINE. Yes.

Mr. GLASS. And I now move to strike out the word "such," on page 5, line 13.

Mr. BLAINE. I think we are making a mistake when we do that, because the language "as such collateral security," in line 13, refers back to the security that is enumerated in prior paragraphs of section 16, so that "as such collateral security" in line 13 should remain there and the word "such" in line 19 should be stricken out. That then would have as its antecedent any collateral security.

Mr. GLASS. It all relates to the requirements of law that certain collateral security in a certain amount shall be behind Federal reserve notes. I think the provision is all right as it is.

Mr. BLAINE. I have no desire to pursue the matter further. I am not sufficiently interested in the section myself, but I thought I should invite the attention of the Senator to it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the Chair to understand that the Senator from Virginia also withdraws his amendment?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is open to further amendment.

Mr. BLAINE. I desire to offer the amendment which I now send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of the bill add a new section, to read as follows:

SEC. 4. The Federal reserve act, as amended, is further amended by adding a new section reading as follows:

"(a) If any member bank to which a Federal reserve bank has made or may in the future make advances shall, immediately preceding or during the life or continuance of such advance, increase its outstanding loans made to any borrower upon collateral security, or made to the members of any organized stock exchange, investment house, or dealer in securities, upon any obligation, note, or bill, secured or unsecured, for the purpose of purchasing and/or carrying any investment security (except obligations of the United States) such advance shall be immediately due and payable, and such member bank shall be ineligible for a period of 90 days as a borrower at any reserve bank upon any and all paper: Provided, however, That the Federal Reserve Board shall have power from time to time in its discretion by unanimous vote of its members to suspend the provisions of this section in whole or in part, whenever in its opinion the public interest shall call for such action. Each such suspension shall be for a period not exceeding 90 days and may be renewed for one additional period not exceeding 90 days during the same calendar year upon unanimous vote of the members of the board: Provided, further, That 90 days shall elapse between any periods of suspension in consecutive calendar years.

"(b) No member bank shall carry any deposit account with any corporation, association, partnership, or individual, other than banks incorporated under the laws of a State or of the United States."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE].

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, in the absence of a number of the Senators, I discussed the purposes of this amendment. I will not undertake any lengthy explanation of it at this time, but I call attention to the fact that the bill now pending does not contain a line or sentence or suggestion that any of the credit provided for in the bill or any of the currency provided for in the bill shall not be used in speculative stock transactions. I think there is a well-grounded fear, and I think there is a well-grounded rumor as well, that a veritable stock-gambling orgy will grow out of this bill. I credit the thought, the purpose, and practically the language of the amendment which I suggest to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], as it is largely taken from a provision in the bill known as Senate bill 3215, introduced by the Senator from Virginia. Beginning on page 27, section 13, of that bill there will be found the provision to which I refer. I have not used exactly the same language, but I have used language to accomplish the same purposes designed by the Senator from Virginia in his original bill, which is now before the Committee on Banking and Currency.

It seems to me, if we are going to protect our commerce and industry and agriculture in their necessities, it becomes necessary to prevent the expanded credit and expanded currency from going into stock-gambling channels. I have already discussed this question somewhat at length, and will make only a brief statement at this time. If later on we shall pass the bill introduced by the Senator from Virginia, the time to provide against the evil may have passed, the injury may have been accomplished, and we may have another "October, 1929," and the beginning of another crisis even worse than the present.

The purpose of this amendment is to provide that the expanded credit and expanded currency to be brought about by the pending bill shall go into the channels of industry, commerce, and agriculture, as originally designed by the authors of the Federal reserve system. I should like to have a record vote upon the amendment.

Mr. KING. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. BLAINE. I yield.

Mr. KING. I am in entire sympathy with the amendment, as I understand it, and, if it is as I understand it, I intend to vote for it; but I should like to ask the Senator by what means the board or a member bank may determine that the money is being diverted from legitimate purposes to illegitimate purposes, to wit, gambling upon the stock exchange, so that they may deny further loans or may call the loans which have been made?

Mr. BLAINE. The means for determining that question can not be set up in law. It is like any other administrative proposition. In my opinion, the penalty that is provided will restrict member banks in their operations. They will fear to violate it, because the time will come when they will be found out, and then, of course, the consequences would be very great. The responsibility, of course, is placed upon our banking institutions to observe the law as passed by Congress. Furthermore, the Federal Reserve Board has considerable authority, and the Comptroller of the Currency makes regular inspection of all the banks that belong to the system, though, of course, not of State banks. We have the Federal Reserve Board with authority to require reports from member banks requesting loans, and, as a matter of fact, in my opinion, it would not require very many sleuths or any sleuths to ascertain whether or not a bank was violating either the letter or the spirit of the proposal.

Mr. KING. As I understand, the Senator has in view the fact that in September, 1929, for instance, there were outstanding $8,167,000,000 of loans made to brokers, as recorded by the New York Stock Exchange; and the presumption is—indeed, I suppose it is the fact—that a large part of that enormous sum was derived from loans through the Federal banks which were thus utilizing the power of the Federal reserve act for the purpose of loaning large sums of money for stock gambling. Does the Senator from Wisconsin think that his amendment, if adopted, would tend to prevent such loans under this bill?

Mr. BLAINE. My own opinion is that it would accomplish the purpose designed; and I think that was in the mind of the Senator from Virginia when he wrote the original proposition in his bill. I have not modified the provision which he wrote so far as the purpose is concerned, but it has been necessary to modify the language. However, I do not recall whether the provision drafted by the Senator from Virginia provided the penalty denying eligibility, but in the amendment which I have offered I have taken into consideration that section 3 is to be in effect for only one year. If our optimists are correct and prosperity is just around the corner, and we are going to have an upturn in business affairs within a reasonable time or within the year, the Federal Reserve Board ought to have the right to suspend this section for the reason that new industry, new undertakings may want to place their stocks upon the market, and, if there is any productive industry that has faith enough in business recovery and revival to be willing to take the risk, we ought to have some elastic provision whereby such new issues of stocks may be cared for. So I have added that to the provision originally designed by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I think it would be most unfortunate to incorporate this very sound provision of the so-called Glass bill, with the modifications suggested by the Senator from Wisconsin, in this emergency bill. Otherwise I should feel greatly embarrassed in going on record against the proposition presented by the Senator from Wisconsin.

In existing law there is a textual provision, inserted deliberately and with purpose, against the use of Federal reserve facilities for speculative purposes. It has been utterly disregarded by the administrators of the law and by the stock-exchange banks, and it has been done with impunity because there is no penalty attached under existing law. We relied exclusively upon the sane judgment and proper intent of the administrators of the act; but in the provision of the so-called Glass bill—which, however, is not the Glass bill, but is a composite bill to the provisions of which other members of the subcommittee have largely contributed—there is provided a penalty, and at a suitable time, when we shall not be embarrassed by hurried and emergency appeals, we will present that measure before long and endeavor to have it passed. I think it would be most unfortunate to attach such a proposition to this bill necessitating very likely long discussion and delay both on this side of the Capitol and on the other, and I hope the Senate will not do it.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I wish to call the attention of the Senate, in view of the statements that have been made here during the last few days in regard to inflation, to the fact that people who have heretofore looked with holy horror upon any mention of a policy of inflation of the currency are now supporting that policy in a limited degree so far as the currency is concerned, for the purpose of making it possible to revive the paralyzed credit system which they failed to inflate during the last year, during which time they have made such noble efforts to revive a policy of inflation, evidently intended to repeat what was started in 1924 and ended in the blowing up of the bubble in 1929. Inflation of the credit system again seems to be considered very respectable and economically sound by some people.

I have not been able to see the difference between inflation of the credit system and inflation of the currency system. The immediate results of either one of the two species of inflation are similar and the ultimate result is always the same. We are on a credit economy instead of a money economy and our financial system and our medium of exchange are based upon credit. I believe the statement can not be controverted that the inflation of the currency in Germany after the war did not destroy any more property, did not deprive more people of their holdings, and did not ruin more people than did the inflation of the credit system, the banking system, in the United States, from 1924 to 1929.

We all know that after the bubble burst there were people who said, "Well, money should not have been loaned for speculation." I say we had inflation of the credit system because what I understand by inflation is a process by which the production of credit increases far in excess of the curve of production. The difference in the rise of the production curve and the rise in the credit or currency curve to take care of production constitutes inflation.

Lest history should repeat itself, let us be warned now when we hear talk of inflation as we certainly were warned in 1924 and 1925, when the banking system of the United States disregarded that warning and brought about the situation that has broken the confidence of the American people in our banking system.

I said that efforts had been made to start the inflation of the credit system during the last year, when Federal reserve discount rates were cut a year ago. It failed to work this time. Now this fetish is brought in, in the hope that it will restore confidence, and so make the credit system work in such a way that inflation can be started.

Why was the effort to inflate the credit system unsuccessful the past year?

There are two things necessary to inflate the credit system. On the one hand, we have to have bankers to lend. On the other hand, we have to have borrowers willing to borrow. But on the descending price level that we have had we have not had borrowers who could borrow. If they had any sense they would not borrow. They could not borrow to-day and start production, because they could not afford to buy raw material to-day. They could buy it cheaper next week; and while the bankers have been accused of hoarding money, I think in this discussion we have overlooked the fact that the borrowers have had a great deal of experience in the last 10 years. They are not so anxious to borrow now. They can not afford to borrow on a descending price level.

A very distinguished banker yesterday told me that the trouble was not with the fact that they did not want to loan, but he said, "We can not find borrowers."

To show how the bankers were put upon notice while they were inaugurating that very destructive credit policy in 1924 and succeeding years, when not only banking credits were inflated but when they underwrote and peddled out to investors in the United States over $70,000,000,000 of new capital issues in 10 years from 1920 to 1930—a sum of new mortgages equal to $700 for every man, woman, and child within the territorial area of the United States, not counting our Territories and dependencies—when the foundation was laid for the blowing up of that bubble, as a foundation may be laid now for the blowing up of another bubble, financial journals in the United States and others called attention to what was going on.

For instance, the Annalist, of New York, on December 15, 1924, said:

> Unlike Shakespeare's mercy, which fell gently from heaven, to-day's flow of business "confidence" suggests the action of powerful pumps.

The Commercial and Financial Chronicle discussed the stock inflation that was just beginning under the editorial caption "Imperfect Working of the Federal Reserve System."

It found that the stock inflation was not justified by increased values and earnings and was artificially due to a "money glut," and that the glut of cheap money for stock speculation was due largely to Federal reserve activities in forcing into the market cash that ought to have been kept in the vault.

During the same month the New York Journal of Commerce, under the editorial head Belated Anxiety, discussed the dangers of stock-market inflation as marking the "unsatisfactory quality of the leadership at Washington as regards banking." It editorially charged the administration with an "investment policy which has beaten down the rate of interest and been more than hazardous for the country at large."

Again the Annalist warned the country and the bankers, and said that we had—

> A cheap money, cheap credit boom.
> Will the racing stock market become a Juggernaut?
> Uneasy business holds the Federal reserve responsible for an inflationary course, which, it begins to fear, may end in a collapse like 1920–21.

"Inflation coming!" was the headline placed over an article by George E. Roberts, vice president of the National City Bank, published in the Financial World.

The market letter of Hayden, Stone & Co. at that time closed with the sentence:

> We feel that the market has entered a zone of decided danger.

Mr. H. Parker Willis, writing in the Annalist, charged that the Federal Reserve Board at that time had pushed into the market $1,100,000,000 by purchase of securities, and that besides this "open-market work" the Federal reserve banks, "under instructions of the Treasury," had forced into circulation as much of the gold coin in their possession as the market could absorb. He stated:

> The reserve banks have not only lowered rates to correspond with the market but have done everything they could to force down rates in the market before they lowered their own charges.

All of the financial authorities that have been cited agree, as expressed in the Annalist, that at that time there were practically unlimited funds with which to speculate in the stock market.

These quotations I have read from an excerpt from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD containing some matters that I called to the attention of the Senate on January 21, 1925. Needless to say, the warnings of the financial journals of the country and others had no effect in curbing the wild orgy of credit inflation that was conducted and put into effect by the banking interests of the country, who, as custodians and controllers of the credit system, have shown that they are as worthy of controlling the credit system of the country as a horse thief would be to be put in charge of a bunch of bronchos out on the prairie that are worth $50 apiece.

Here is an amendment—the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE]—that has for its purpose the prevention of another orgy of speculation, of another program of debauchery of the credit system that is the property of the people of the United States, intrusted to banks to administer as trust funds, to prevent their being used to blow another bubble to wreak its effects upon the business interests of the country, to permit people to be swindled out of their earnings by those who are in control of the credit system, and who, instead of conducting their affairs in a legitimate way as legitimate banking ought to be conducted, have shown themselves to be stock and bond racketeers; and certainly no one with sense can blame the people of the United States for having lost confidence in the banking system.

I do not believe we are going to be able to restore the confidence of the people in the banking system until we get better banking methods. I realize that we can not make a man a good banker by law; but we can by law prevent him from conducting his business in such a manner that instead of that business, created by law, being beneficial to business and to the general welfare, corporations created by the Government have become more powerful than their creator; and if they are not curbed in their policies, if they are allowed to continue, they may destroy their very creator.

I think the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin ought to be adopted.

This is said to be an emergency measure.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. In a moment.

The correction of bad practices in a banking system is always an emergency matter, and I believe that this amendment is an emergency measure.

I now yield to the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. MORRISON. I desire to ask the Senator if he will state that any bank ever did get any money from a Federal reserve bank for the purpose of speculation. If so, how did the bank get it?

As I understand the law, the purposes for which the regional banks issue notes or loan money are distinctly specified and are almost altogether embraced in discounting notes arising out of commercial transactions and for commercial purposes and business in process. I understand that no bank could get any note discounted for any other purpose, as none has ever done so; and, as to these particular funds, they certainly did not get them for the purpose of speculating on the stock exchange.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I will say to the Senator that this amendment applies, as I understand, to section 3, under which money can be raised on Government bonds, and there is no limitation as to the purposes for which the money can be used. Of course, when eligible paper is discounted at the Federal reserve banks, it releases other money that can be loaned for speculation. It is an indirect process, but no one will deny that the conduct of the Federal reserve banks during that period of years facilitated the loaning of funds and the use of funds for speculative purposes.

Mr. MORRISON. I agree with the Senator that there must have been great abuse, particularly just preceding the collapse; but I submit that that was out of other funds of the banks, and did not come from the Federal reserve system, because they could not have obtained the funds for any purposes except those therein specifically enumerated, and that the money with which they speculated was other funds. It is true they might not have needed the discounts if they had used the funds with which they speculated for the purposes of keeping business in process and alive; but I do not think the Federal reserve system ever discounted any note for any such purpose as there seems to be some impression that they did do.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Virginia?

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. On the contrary, when stock speculation was at its peak, and the Federal Reserve Board in Washington undertook to admonish against the use of Federal reserve facilities for stock speculative purposes, a director of a certain Federal reserve bank gave defiance to the Federal Reserve Board, and publicly and purposely announced through the press that the very next day he intended to rediscount to the extent of $25,000,000 and loan it on the stock exchange, and that in his conception of the matter his obligation was first to the stock market and secondarily to the Federal reserve system.

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. President, if I may ask the Senator from Virginia a question, the discounts would necessarily have been a paper of the character which the law provided the Federal reserve bank might discount, would they not?

Mr. GLASS. The discounts would have been under the 15-day provision, and United States bonds would have been used for the purpose. But in the last analysis the avowed purpose of the discount was to use the funds on the stock exchange, and they were so used.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Virginia. I remember the incident. The bank was a

New York bank, and the Senator is correct. I believe that took place in 1929. The damage, of course, had been done long before that, when the Federal reserve bank cut their discount rate three times, I believe, in April, again in June, and again in August, 1924. The damage was done during 1924, 1925, 1926, 1927, and 1928, because that was when the inflation was going on, and disciplinary measures of the Federal Reserve Board did not start until after the damage was done. Whether they amounted to more than talk or not I do not know. They did start to raise rates in 1929. The floodgates of credit inflation had been opened, and the country was told by the economists of the country and the bankers and statesmen in Washington that it was prosperity instead of a bubble, and that financial leadership of this country cost the American people at least sixty-five to seventy billion dollars. That leadership is still the financial leadership of the country.

In view of that fact it is the duty of the Government to scrutinize every proposal made by these people who have been guilty of wrecking the finances of this country, who are still looked upon as the leaders of the financial system, and the Government should put up every bar possible to prevent them from committing the same almost criminal mistakes again that they have made during the last seven or eight years.

We have heard a great deal about the banking system of England. It is said there are no bank failures there, because they have a system of branch banks. As a matter of fact, the banks of England do not buy bonds and stocks, as our banks are permitted to do. They have not these affiliates through which they gamble with the depositors' funds and then go out and peddle stocks around to the poor investors of the country and rob them of their savings. They confine their commercial business to legitimate commercial dealings, lending money upon collateral.

I do not believe we are going to be able to restore the confidence of the American people in the banking system until we take our banks out of the bond and stock "racket" and drive them back to a legitimate banking business.

We do not see in the papers of London headlines to the effect that "the banks of London are out to-day to support the market," as we see in the New York papers.

I do not know whether this amendment will be as effective as it is hoped it will be, but I think it ought to be adopted.

Mr. CONNALLY obtained the floor.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts. I thank the Senator, as I must leave the Chamber at once.

In connection with this debate I ask that some correspondence I have had on the subject of the measure before the Senate, together with a bill and amendment submitted by me, be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the matter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

A bill (S. 2675) providing for an emergency circulation fund, and for other purposes

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby directed to have printed and to keep on hand United States Treasury notes under a special account to be called the "emergency circulation fund." Such notes shall be in the same denominations as the Treasury notes issued to the Federal reserve agents. Any bank, corporation, or citizen of the United States shall have the right to deposit United States bonds in the amount of $1,000, or multiples thereof, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, and to receive from such fund 90 per cent of the face value of such bonds in United States Treasury notes, and shall have the right at any time within 12 months to redeem such bonds by repaying in United States currency the amount so received by him on account of such bonds, with interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum on such amount. Failure to redeem such bonds within the limit of 12 months shall operate as a forfeiture of such bonds to the United States. Any moneys received from such sale may be exchanged with other moneys in the Treasury so that this fund shall consist alone of such Treasury notes. The principal of all sums so advanced when repaid shall be returned to the "emergency circulation fund," and all interest and profits upon such advances shall be passed to the credit of the Treasury under miscellaneous receipts. The actual amount of notes held in the "emergency circulation fund" shall never be less than $100,000,000 in excess of any outstanding advances. Said fund shall neither be increased nor diminished except in the manner provided.

Amendment intended to be proposed by Mr. WALSH of Massachusetts to the bill (S. 2675) providing for an emergency circulation fund, and for other purposes, viz:

On page 1, line 8, preceding the word "Any," insert a new clause, as follows: "Whenever and as long as the average wholesale price of commodities in the United States, as indicated by the revised index of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, stands below the level indicated by the figure 95.00 in said index,"

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 25, 1932.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR WALSH: I thank you for the opportunity of reading the volume of correspondence which you have received relative to S. 2675, proposing an emergency currency.

I think your amendment proposing to limit the operation of this proposed act and cause it to cease whenever the general commodity index reaches 95.00 is a special safeguard that would make it impossible for anyone to contend that such an act would unduly expand the currency.

I was very pleased to find so large a number of bankers and business men of the highest standing approving the principle and purpose of your bill. It may be of some interest to you to have my comments on the objections which were made, or rather suggested, by some of those who replied.

First, it was suggested that it might inflate the currency. It is the intention to expand the currency, but not to inflate the currency, because the word "inflate" means to expand unduly and without sufficient reason.

The manner in which your bill is drawn makes it impossible to expand the currency unreasonably, for the right to obtain currency under the bill would cease before commodity values were restored to normal. Under the amendment which you have drawn, the right to obtain money under this bill would cease when the commodity index reached 95.00. This is an automatic check against possible inflation.

It should be observed that people who have bonds will not go to the trouble and expense of borrowing on them at 5 per cent, with a 10 per cent forfeit, unless they really need the currency to meet a serious need under the present depression. To this extent they are entitled to relief, and it is to the benefit of the Government to extend it, as it would cause the Government bonds to go to par and would enable the Government, in new issues of bonds, to get a cheaper rate.

A second objection was suggested, that your bill would be ineffective and useless because banks can get all the money they want at 3½ per cent from the Federal reserve banks, with United States bonds as security, and therefore would not use the plan you proposed.

One of the letters from a very distinguished man suggested that the reserve banks would issue reserve notes against United States bonds at 3½ per cent, and that this would be cheaper than money at 5 per cent. This is a serious error. Reserve banks do not issue reserve notes against Government bonds. They may issue reserve-bank notes against 2 per cent bonds with the circulating privilege, but these bonds are not available and no relief can come from that source.

The reserve banks can lend money to member banks on their notes, secured by Government bonds, but they do this only on terms of 15 days and then from day to day, and do not issue new currency against them. So that there is no available new currency to be issued from that source except against eligible bills. These bills are largely held in the reserve cities and the banks in the reserve cities are not employing these bills to any substantial extent because they are hoarding credit as well as currency, so that the relief from this source is not adequate.

Moreover, the suggestion that credit can be obtained from the reserve banks by the member banks has no point, for the reason that it does not provide additional currency for circulation but merely provides credit against circulation already existing. The point is, the country needs currency in circulation to make good the vacuum produced by hoarding. It needs a means of quick currency to mitigate the fear which has produced hoarding, and the extension of credit to member banks is not sufficient, for it does not put new money in circulation.

The psychological effect of your bill is of very great importance, because when you tell the people of the country that the Treasury will issue currency against bonds on as large a scale as is necessary the fear should abate, and with the issuance of currency for circulation commodity values would begin to rise, and in that way stimulate production and consumption by stimulating additional employment. Moreover, the immediate rise of the United States bonds through this bill would stimulate confidence throughout the country and help to abate the fear upon which the depression is based. It would greatly serve the banks by giving new courage to their depositors and putting an end to the withdrawal of money for hoarding.

It will be observed that the objection that your bill would be ineffective and useless because not used is a flat contradiction of the first objection, that it would create great inflation.

The third objection suggested was that the banks could get currency on 2 per cent bonds more cheaply than through your plan for emergency currency. The answer to this is that all of these bonds are hypothecated in the Treasury to safeguard the national-bank currency.

The fourth objection suggested is that bond-secured currency is unsound because it is "money based on debt." The answer to this is that all national-bank notes are based on Government bonds; that all Federal reserve bank notes are based on Government bonds; that the Federal reserve notes are based 100 per cent on debts in the form of eligible bills, safeguarded by an additional 40 per cent minimum gold reserve. In fact, all of the money we employ is merely a promise to pay of the Government.

It is a debt of the Government in part secured by bonds, in part secured by gold and silver. There is no force whatever to this objection. The objection itself shows a grave misconception of what the law is and of what money is. The objection that an emergency currency would be based on debts seems unintelligent and without merit.

A fifth objection was made by one of your correspondents, that he saw no difference between this plan and the way Germany inflated and depreciated the mark in 1923. This objection is based on ignorance of the facts and is without merit. In 1923 the German Government deposited its own bonds in the Reichsbank and the Reichsbank issued marks against the bonds, and then the Government paid out the marks for current expenses. In your bill the Government does not receive any of the money, it does not spend any of the money, and does not put up its bonds. The bonds are put up by the citizen. The citizen receives the money on the bonds and returns it in due time. The Government earns 5 per cent on the loan, and if the bonds are not redeemed the Government retires its own bonds in lieu of the currency loaned, and on selling such bonds the currency would be withdrawn from circulation into the Treasury again.

A sixth objection suggested is that under your bill speculators could buy United States bonds at 82 and sell them at 90. Clearly this suggestion is without merit, because if your bill should pass the people who hold the bonds would not part with them at 82 nor at 90, for these bonds would go to par with this privilege provided by law. This would be useful to the United States and enable the Government to sell any new issues of bonds at a much better price than at present.

A seventh objection was made that the threat of "inflation" would alarm and shock the financiers and business men and lead to a hoarding of gold and silver certificates, of Federal reserve notes, and national bank notes. The threat of abundant money would "shock" the financiers and business men with delight and make their hoarding of money unnecessary and unintelligent. The only financiers who would perhaps be annoyed might be the ones who desired to take advantage of the distress of other men by obtaining their securities beneath their value.

An eighth objection was that the threat of "inflation" would alarm Europeans, who have deposits in American banks, and that they would withdraw a billion or more in gold. The answer to this whispered objection is that it is a false alarm. No "inflation" can ensue under your bill. A justified expansion to check the most dangerous deflation in American history is not "inflation," and would meet the approval of people with common sense in Europe.

But even if Europeans should withdraw their deposits in gold, it would be serviceable both to the United States and Europe, for we are making an uneconomical use of gold and we could spare a billion of gold without harm, and a billion of gold transferred to Europe would cause rising values in Europe to the advantage both of Europe and the United States, as a stimulus and reaction against the present depression and unemployment. We have a billion of gold certificates floating now, which could be sequestered at will by the reserve banks if it were desired.

The threat that Europe would deprive us of gold is peculiarly absurd, since Europe owes us $20,000,000,000, and is calling on us annually for large additional loans.

I have observed one objection, which is somewhat obscurely put, and that is that your bill is undesirable because it would mean rising prices of labor and commodities, and the country will be better off to deflate labor and establish the cost of living on the present basis of the purchasing power of the dollar. This is the view of the ultraconservative who thinks alone in terms of acquisition, and whose sympathies are not excited by the present distress of the people and the unemployment of millions of our innocent fellow citizens who are the victims of this national financial tragedy. The deflation of labor and the lowering of the standards of living, which we enjoyed previous to this depression, can not be approved and will not be approved by the American people nor openly defended by those who oppose your bill.

Before this depression took place our annual income was ninety billions. It is now sixty billions, and due to this, the huge deficit in our national revenue has taken place. This national loss of revenues should be corrected as speedily as possible by restoring prices to normal and deflating the present purchasing power of money.

The best means with which to end the present deficit is not high taxes but the restoring of the value of commodities, the restoring of prosperity, the restoring of employment, and of the productive energies of the Nation, and the restoring of our national income. To this objective we should bend our energies regardless of the opposition of the disciples of acquisition.

Already the concentration of wealth in a few hands has gone to an extremely dangerous point, which jeopardizes the national welfare and jeopardizes the interests of the few who hold the concentrated wealth of the Nation.

Yours respectfully,

ROBERT L. OWEN.

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 17, 1932.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR WALSH: In answer to your request for my comments on the letter of February 10, of Hon. Eugene Meyer, Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, I respectfully comply.

Mr. Meyer criticizes your bill, S. 2675, and states, first: "Apparently the Treasury notes to be printed under this bill would not be redeemable, and the legislation would be of a permanent character." Mr. Meyer apparently overlooks the fact that under the laws of the United States such money would be interchangeable with gold certificates by the United States Treasury on demand.

In the next place, the same identical principle of bond-secured currency appears in the Glass-Steagall bill 3616, and Mr. Ogden Mills, present Secretary of the United States Treasury and ex officio Governor of the Federal Reserve Board, expressed the opinion before the Banking and Currency Committee of the House that this legislation would preferably be permanent, so that this principle of your bill is not without support from the present head of the Federal Reserve Board, Mr. Ogden Mills.

Your bill, S. 2675, was permanent but provided for emergency circulation under a penalty of 5 per cent interest and a 10 per cent forfeiture, with the proviso that it should be inoperative when the commodity index reached 95. This automatically would preclude the possibility of excess expansion, or the possibility, therefore, of inflation.

Your bill made this remedy available directly, without the intermediary of a member bank or of a Federal reserve bank or the Federal Reserve Board, by a simple authorization that any bank, corporation, or persons could get the benefit of it under the safeguards provided.

The present Glass-Steagall bill, which apparently meets Mr. Meyer's approval (S. 3616) simply amends in section 3 of said bill the second paragraph of section 16 of the Federal reserve act by adding to the collateral security required of the reserve banks, as a basis of currency issue, the words "direct obligations of the United States" (p. 5); in other words, it authorizes the reserve banks to request, and the reserve agents to deliver, Federal notes against United States bonds as collateral security to the extent that there is available in the reserve banks 40 per cent gold cover. This automatically restricts the issue of such notes and prevents undue expansion or inflation, just as your bill prevents inflation by other means above cited.

Mr. Meyer intimates that the advantages of your proposal would be only to holders of bonds having a market value of less than 90. The objection is unsound for the reason that authorizing loans of money against such bonds of the Treasury would cause such bonds to go to par immediately, and already United States bonds have reacted to the promise of the passage of such bill, but even 2 per cent bonds with the circulation privilege are at par.

Mr. Meyer says, "In addition, the introduction into the currency system of the country of a new issue of the character contemplated by this bill, would be confusing and would create uncertainty as to its exact relation to the other currency obligations of the United States." This criticism is not valid for the reason that under the law of 1891 and the Federal reserve act, such notes being freely interchangeable, as required of the Treasury Department by a statute law, would create no uncertainty whatever.

Moreover, such currency would not be issued except where seriously needed and the parties were willing to pay substantially for the privilege of borrowing currency.

The currency issued under your bill is safeguarded, first, by a 10 per cent forfeiture, if not returned to the Treasury within 12 months; a 5 per cent interest charge paid to the United States Treasury adding to its income. It is secured by United States bonds 11 per cent in excess of the amount of money loaned.

The Glass-Steagall bill, which meets my approval, is secured by Government bonds and 40 per cent gold, which, in my opinion, adds nothing to the value of the security, but only operates to prevent inflation, and is not as well safeguarded as your bill because your bill penalizes the loan currency by an interest charge of 5 per cent, while the loan of currency to the reserve banks is made without this restraint or payment to the Government.

The operation of your bill automatically ceases when the commodity index rises to 95. The pending measure, which even the administration now approves, is only operative when, if, and as the Federal Reserve Board may "deem it in the public interest," and may, "upon the affirmative vote of not less than a majority of its members holding office at the time, authorize the Federal reserve banks to offer—and the Federal reserve agents to accept as such collateral security—direct obligations of the United States." This possible relief expires at the end of one year in any event, or sooner, should the Federal Reserve Board so decide. In other words, the relief offered by the pending bill is not only temporary and transitory but may be at any time vetoed by the Federal Reserve Board.

Your bill is permanent and functions in any case of emergency or depression, where the commodity index goes below 95. It is impossible to inflate the currency under your bill. The bill was drawn to prevent inflation and to automatically overcome the present exaggerated deflation of credit and currency.

Mr. Meyer says (p. 3): "It should also be borne in mind that there is no shortage of currency in this country; on the contrary, there has been for a considerable period of time a practically continuous increase in the amount of currency outstanding." The implication of this sentence is that there is abundant currency in circulation and circulating which, of course, is contradicted by Mr. Meyer in the next sentence, for he recognizes the fact that the available currency of the country is locked up by hoarding.

He says in conclusion of his argument against bond-secured emergency currency, that "in the circumstances, the new facilities which would be set up for obtaining currency, might be expected to promote hoarding, and, in this respect, the existing situation might be made worse, rather than better. That offering the country all the currency it requires, under a reasonable charge, to overcome hoarding, would itself promote hoarding, is so obviously contrary to sound reasoning that it answers itself. If such an objection were valid, it would apply with equal force against the pending measure, S. 3616."

The opposition of Mr. Meyer is in accord with the opposition of Mr. Mellon, who has recently expressed himself against bond-secured currency.

Mr. Ogden Mills a short time ago was opposed to bond-secured currency, but has yielded on this point and thinks it should be a permanent part of the system for emergency purposes.

He made an excellent statement to that effect before the Banking and Currency Committee of the House in support of the pending measure, and the administration is now supporting it. Mr. Meyer's letter has merely reflected the current opinion of the administration, which was opposed to bond-secured currency, even for an emergency. The exigencies of the case and the needs of the country are so great that the administration has finally yielded this much relief and is supporting the pending measure. Mr. Meyer, in concluding his letter, says: "For the considerations above cited, the board feels that such legislation would be inadvisable." So he spoke for the board.

The letter of Mr. Silas H. Strawn, president of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States of America, of January 13, in which he says he "does not approve of an increase in bond-secured currency," and that he "fears the method proposed of increasing the currency supplied would result in less rather than more confidence," was another expression of the opinion which dominated the administration until within the last few days.

I congratulate you upon having promoted the principle of emergency circulation of Treasury notes, based on Government bonds, safeguarded against inflation. Under the pending measure, I believe the country will get a great measure of relief, and that confidence will be gradually restored. Let us be thankful for the immediate promised relief.

But, Senator, our great Republic has a dire need for a complete study of what has occurred to this country, causing the present depression. It is my profound conviction that such panics can be absolutely prevented, and that there are remedies available, if they are diligently sought for, and this matter given the intelligent consideration which the representatives of the people in the Senate and the House might give under the leadership which is now available in both Houses.

Yours respectfully,

ROBERT L. OWEN.

FEDERAL RESERVE BOARD,
Washington, February 10, 1932.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR WALSH: Reference is made to your letter of January 9, 1932, in which you requested the views of the board in regard to Senate bill No. 2675, entitled "A bill providing for an emergency circulation, and for other purposes."

The bill would direct the Secretary of the Treasury to print and keep on hand United States Treasury notes which any holder of United States bonds would have the right to obtain to the extent of 90 per cent of the face value of any such bonds when deposited by him in the amount of $1,000 or multiples thereof. It also provides that such holder shall have the right to redeem such bonds at any time within 12 months by repaying in United States currency the amount received by him on account of such bonds, with interest at the rate of 5 per cent per annum thereon. It further provides that failure to redeem such bonds within 12 months shall operate as a forfeiture of the bonds to the United States. Apparently the Treasury notes to be printed under this bill would not be redeemable and the legislation would be of a permanent character.

It appears from this résumé that the bill would enable holders of United States bonds to obtain Treasury notes of the special issue provided for, to the extent of 90 per cent of the par value of the bonds, even though their market value might be less than 90. Stated differently, holders of such bonds could sell them to the United States at any time at 90 and have them carried by the United States for a year, with the privilege of repurchase upon payment of 5 per cent interest. The bill imposes no obligation upon the holder of the bonds to redeem them or to pay the prescribed rate of interest in case of failure to do so, and whether such bonds could be resold by the Treasury or whether they must be retired at the end of the year is not made clear, notwithstanding that they may have maturities far into the future.

In view of the fact that holders of United States bonds can, in the great majority of cases, obtain loans from banks on the basis of these bonds as collateral, the advantages, if any, that the proposal would afford would be to holders of bonds having a market value of less than 90 or to holders who, by reason of exceptional local banking conditions, may not be able to obtain credit on the basis of any collateral. It is unlikely that cases of the latter class are numerous or representative.

In addition, the introduction into the currency system of the country of a new issue of the character contemplated by this bill would be confusing and would create uncertainty as to its exact relation to the other currency obligations of the United States.

It should also be borne in mind that there is no currency shortage in this country, but that, on the contrary, there has been for a considerable period of time a practically continuous increase in the amount of currency outstanding. For the year ending February 3, 1932, this increase has amounted altogether to $1,055,000,000. Since it is obvious that the volume of currency required to carry on the business of the country has diminished very materially, it is apparent that the increase of currency outstanding has been due to other factors, the most important of which has been a growth in the habit of hoarding. In the circumstances the new facilities which would be set up for obtaining currency might be expected to promote hoarding, and in this respect the existing situation might be made worse rather than better.

There are, of course, other considerations involved in an analysis of this bill which, however, would lead to the same general conclusion, and in the circumstances the board feels that such legislation would be inadvisable.

Very truly yours,

EUGENE MEYER, Governor.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: Referring to your communication of January 11, attached to which is a copy of the bill introduced by you providing for an emergency circulation fund, I heartily agree with the views expressed by you as to the benefits to be derived from the use of such a fund.

The letter of Senator Owen is one of the clearest detailed statements regarding causes of the depression and its continuance that I have had the privilege of reading, and as his views obviously express your own and they have been made the basis of your bill, I feel your efforts to create this emergency fund should receive very generous support.

Yours very truly,

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
Committee on Finance, United States Senate,
Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I duly received your favor of the 11th instant, and have read with very much interest copy of the bill which you submitted to the Senate providing for an emergency circulation fund.

Let me say I am entirely in sympathy with your proposal and believe that under existing conditions a move that will provide for an increase in circulation for the limited period stated can not help but be of immediate benefit. We are suffering in this country from a state of fear on the part of banks and individuals which has prompted hoarding to an extent that is severely handicapping business. Passage of your bill would certainly have the effect of aiding in the removal of this hindrance to normal business.

Very truly yours.

E. T. WEIR.

The Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,

MY DEAR SIR: Referring to your letter of January 11, I have read hurriedly the proposed circulation bill, and from what I know from reading the same it seems to me it would be helpful, and I should be in favor of it.

Yours very truly,

Senator DAVID I. WALSH,
Senate Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I have yours of the 11th, inclosing copy of a bill providing for an emergency circulation fund, and for other purposes.

If such a measure is used only for emergency purposes and in a limited way, I think it would do great good. Am of the opinion that if such a measure had been a law a year ago the deflation in some sections of the country would have been less severe.

Yours very truly,

T. R. PRESTON, President.

Hon. DAVID I. WALSH,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: Have your letter of January 11 inclosing copy of your bill proposing an emergency circulation fund.

Think this is a mighty fine proposition to be put up at this time and that it will be one of the things that will help to solve our present lack of confidence in financial circles, and it is necessary if we are going to stop this terrible depression and turn our country again toward prosperity.

I sincerely hope that we get the benefits from this bill in a very few days.

Yours very truly,

C. SLUSSER,
Vice President and Factory Manager.

MEMORANDUM ON POSSIBLE CREDIT UNDER PENDING BILL

In the bulletin of February 3, 1932, of the Federal Reserve Board, giving the resources and liabilities of the 12 Federal reserve banks (in millions) it appears—

That there was in the possession of the reserve banks in gold $2,970,000,000;

That the reserve notes in circulation were $2,664,000,000.

This would require a gold reserve of 40 per cent, or $1,065,000,000 on $2,664,000,000 of reserve notes.

The member bank deposits as reserves were $1,937,000,000, which would require, at 35 per cent, $467,000,000 in gold.

The total gold required, therefore, against Federal reserve notes, and the member banks' deposits would be $1,531,000,000, leaving a balance of gold above the legal reserve requirement of $1,449,000,000.

This would support two and one-half times its volume in Federal reserve notes, or $3,622,000,000 of new money (on 40 per cent basis) which might be issued against "direct obligations of the United States," in section 3 of the pending bill. Or, on the other hand, it would support loans to member banks (on 35 per cent basis) which they could use as reserve deposits equal to $4,140,000,000.

The loans of the Federal reserve banks to member banks, of $4,140,000,000 would support a credit structure of eleven times that amount, if the credits were used to the maximum capacity of the legal reserve requirements of the member banks, as disclosed by their present actual practice.

For example:

The legal requirements of member banks not in reserve cities are 7 per cent on demand deposits and 3 per cent on time deposits; in reserve cities, 10 per cent on demand deposits and 3 per cent on time deposits; in central reserve cities, 13 per cent on demand deposits and 3 per cent on time deposits.

On February 10, 1932, the bulletin of the Federal Reserve Board on the condition of weekly reporting member banks in leading cities (not including member banks with smaller reserve requirements and not in leading cities) shows these banks to have total loans of $16,814,000,000, with reserves of $1,442,000,000, or an average of less than 9 per cent of reserves, with a lending power actually exercised of eleven times the reserves.

If the Federal reserve banks should use the full powers of lending on United States bonds, under this bill, they could (as a matter of possibility) create reserves for member banks up to an increase of $4,140,000,000, and on such conceivable reserves the member banks could lend eleven times as much; that is, $45,540,000,000 in excess of their present loans.

The present total loans of all member banks are $19,000,000,000.

Demand deposits are $15,000,000,000.

Time deposits are $11,000,000,000.

Obviously, under this bill, the loans of the member banks could be extended very many times beyond any possible requirements. The needs of the country are much less in times of depression, except in cases where distressed borrowers require accommodation to prevent forced liquidation at a time when their assets might be sacrificed by a forced sale when there are no available buyers.

It does no harm to give these additional facilities to the banks, and they will not be employed except to a small extent, and then only where really necessary.

It should be remembered that member banks, in making loans, can require adequate security which, even if not immediately salable, would have an assured value more than sufficient to protect such loans.

Under these conditions of available credit it should be obvious that the banks of the United States have no sound reason to deny credit to the industries and commerce of the country, since credit is readily available under this bill.

Moreover, it should be apparent that the banks of the country should recognize their duty to the American people of helping as speedily as possible to overcome the unreasoning fear which has been excited by the recent depression.

The gold above referred to does not include "earmarked" gold of European powers deposited for safekeeping in the reserve banks.

Moreover, there are in circulation $877,000,000 of gold certificates which could be easily absorbed by the Federal reserve banks within a few weeks by simply exchanging Federal reserve notes for such gold certificates as they pass over the counters of the Federal reserve banks.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield to me while I ask the Senator from Virginia a question?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. BORAH. I wanted to ask the Senator what the probabilities are that the principal measure involved in this amendment will be reported out? I understand it is now being considered by a committee.

Mr. GLASS. It will be considered by the general Committee on Banking and Currency and has precedence of all other measures on the calendar of that committee. It is a continuous order of the Banking and Currency Committee. I hope to have it on the floor of the Senate within 10 days or 2 weeks, if not earlier.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, if the Senator from Texas will yield to me, I do not care whether this amendment is adopted as an amendment to the pending bill or to a bill that is to come in later; but there is one thing we are sure of, that the pending bill will pass and that there is a great deal of opposition to the other bill from the bankers of the country, and I doubt very much whether it has any chance of passing. For that reason I thought this amendment ought to ride through on the pending bill, because the banking interests of the country are for this bill.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Texas yield to me?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. GLASS. I will remind the Senator from Minnesota that there was a good deal of opposition on the part of the bankers to the original Federal reserve act, but it did pass. I am not willing to assume that the Congress of the United States is going to permit certain bankers of the country to draft legislation for it.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to say to the Senator from Minnesota that it occurs to me the amendment is more likely to go through as an amendment to the principal bill than as an amendment on the pending bill.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, if I may have just one more minute——

Mr. CONNALLY. I hope the Senator will be brief.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I remember when the sponsors of the McNary-Haugen bill and the sponsors of the McFadden banking bill made a deal by which one group was to support the contentions of the other. That deal did not include the signing of the two bills by the President. The McFadden banking bill was signed, and the McNary-Haugen bill, the farm bill, was beaten.

Mr. CONNALLY. Mr. President, with respect to the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] and the remarks of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD], it seems to me that the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] have expressed the view which the Senate ought to adopt; that is, that within a very short time the proposition involved in the Senator's amendment will be brought before the Senate in a permanent piece of legislation. It will then have come here with the approval of the committee which has been considering the subject for a long time, it will be matured, and will be the result of real consideration.

We are in no frame of mind at the present moment to go beyond what is contained in the pending bill. Frankly, it is an emergency measure, it is intended to meet a temporary emergency in the business and financial affairs of the country, and I hope that the Senator from Wisconsin and the Senator from Minnesota will not delay the passage of this legislation by seeking to engraft upon it these provisions, which will be brought in, under the assurance of the Senator from Virginia, within a very short time and will be considered by the Senate.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. CONNALLY. I yield.

Mr. BLAINE. I just wanted to call the Senator's attention to an inaccuracy in statement, which, of course, the Senator did not mean. The first section of the pending bill, and perhaps the most important section of the bill, which will furnish most of the extensions of credit, is a permanent feature, and will be a continuing law. So that the emergency part of this bill is very inconsequential as compared with the permanent feature of the bill.

Mr. CONNALLY. I am aware of what the Senator suggests, that the first portion of the bill is going to be included in the permanent legislation proposed by the Senator from Virginia; but I do not see that that changes the situation.

Mr. President, I believe this bill offers more hope for the financial recovery of the country than any measure which has been considered by the Senate at this session, and it ought to be passed as speedily as is consistent with proper consideration by this body.

I want to suggest that the thanks of the country are due to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] for his authorship of this measure and for his lucid and forceful exposition of its provisions before the Senate. No man in the country has a broader or more fundamental grasp of financial legislation than the distinguished and able Senator from Virginia. The Senate understands the measure now before it. Senators know what it provides. I want to urge that we enact it before we conclude our deliberations to-night.

Mr. President, it is said that the bill will provide inflation. That is one of the reasons why I favor it. In no true sense are we presented with inflation when we are undertaking to secure restoration from a deflation. We have had deflation throughout the United States, deflation not alone of money in circulation but deflation of credits. It would be more proper to say that the bill provides an antidote for the deflation under which we have been suffering. Frankly, that is one of the reasons why I favor the bill before the Senate. According to my view, the effect of the legislation, if properly availed of by the banks, will have a tendency to and will no doubt result in increasing commodity prices. These are results which I am sure all of us are anxious to see accomplished.

In the course of the debate it has been said that the banks have been guilty of hoarding. That statement is no doubt true, and yet it need not necessarily follow that the banks have been wilful or that they have acted through improper motives in hoarding their resources. All of us know that the banks have been suffering from panic. They have been shell shocked, as it were, by fear, fear of their depositors withdrawing their balances, fear that if they loaned their available resources in the form of cash they would not be able to replenish those resources of cash from the Federal reserve bank. They have been tight even with their eligible paper for fear they would need it at some future time and would not have it readily at hand.

So, Mr. President, what has happened has been that not only individuals have withdrawn their money from the banks, but the banks themselves in all parts of the country have enforced collections, have enforced distressed collections when they should not have been enforced. They have refused to make loans when they should have made loans. They have refused to avail themselves of the facilities of the Federal reserve banks when those banks have had the resources with which they could have responded by the issuance of additional currency in the form of Federal reserve notes.

We have been told by the Senator from Virginia that at the present time there is in the banks of the United States $8,500,000,000 in eligible commercial paper and that only a very small portion of that amount has been hypothecated at the Federal reserve banks and loans made thereon. The Senator from Virginia told us that it will be possible under the provisions of this bill to increase the actual circulation of currency—not credit, but money—to the extent of $1,500,000,000.

Mr. President, we have already expanded credit through the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, but more important than the expansion of credit is the expansion of the volume of money in circulation. All of us know that the volume of money in circulation is the barometer which measures the prices of commodities. All of us know that to-day that money is too high, gold is too dear, and the result is that commerce and business are suffering from the fact that the country is not supplied with even a normal amount of currency.

What have the banks been doing? I read from a letter received yesterday from a prominent citizen of my State who is a student of these matters:

> I learned of one country bank this morning which has $20,000 more cash and Liberty bonds than its entire deposits. I learned of another in the same town that lacks only $20,000 of having enough cash and Liberty Bonds to retire its deposits. At the same time in that same town a man was forced to sell some eight head of cattle in order to pay a $75 loan from one of these banks. I know of another case where a banker, who has probably 70 per cent of his deposits in cash, is unduly frightened by reason of the failure of some banks in that same county.
> A great many small banks have from 50 to 100 per cent cash or its equivalent to take care of their depositors and these banks will not loan a dollar to anybody.

We can not blame entirely the banks for this condition. Some of them were not as conservative as they probably ought to have been. I have in mind one in which I was a stockholder. It is now closed, and, of course, the holdings of the stockholders have been wiped out. A run forced it to the wall. Every other bank in that whole section of the country, alarmed by the run on the bank which failed and closed, tightened up its vaults, tightened up its credit facilities, and refused to extend loans even where they were able to do so.

In the section from which I come, I believe I am safe in saying that the banks as a whole are to-day in a more liquid condition than they have been for years. One banker told me, "I have in my own vaults within $20,000 of sufficient cash to pay all of my deposits." He is a very conservative and very safe banker. Why did he hold this much cash? Because he was afraid that unless he had that cash in his vaults he would not be able to carry on his normal banking business.

Mr. President, we have also been told by the distinguished Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] that through the third section of the bill what is known as free gold in the Federal reserve banks will be utilized, if it is necessary to utilize it, so that there will be no danger from any prospective withdrawals of gold by foreign governments, and that that gold will then be utilized as the reserve required by law against issues of Federal reserve notes.

This bill, in my view, will accomplish more toward restoration of economic conditions than any single measure or, indeed, all of the measures along this line which Congress has passed. The Reconstruction Finance Corporation loans will probably go largely to the great railroads, the great insurance companies, and a few large banks; but under this measure facilities are provided whereby any bank anywhere in a solvent condition, with sound paper, even though it may not be eligible for rediscount under the existing law, may secure enlarged credit and if necessary a greater volume of currency or cash. It will relieve the banks of the country of the fear from which they have been suffering. It will make it possible for every small business man, small tradesman, anyone who is entitled to credit and who has any assets of real value, to secure the necessary credit with which to transact his normal business and to conduct his normal operations.

Mr. President, in conclusion I again express my gratitude to the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] for bringing forth this legislation at this time. It is intended to provide for an emergency. The emergency is here in all of its depressing effect. I trust that Senators will not urge amendments which could more properly be considered on the bill which the Senator from Virginia will shortly report to the Senate for permanent operation. I trust that we may give the country this real constructive piece of legislation without further delay. It is really the only true ray of hopeful light that I have seen in all the legislation which has heretofore been considered by the Senate at this session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE].

Mr. BLAINE. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). The senior Senator from Virginia [Mr. SWANSON] is necessarily absent. I have a pair with him, but I understand that if present he would vote as I shall vote, so I feel free to vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. BLAINE (when Mr. LA FOLLETTE's name was called). My colleague the senior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE] is unavoidably absent. I have been unable to obtain a pair for him. I am authorized to announce that if he were present and voting he would vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. GLENN]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote.

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BROOKHART (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a pair with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. LA FOLLETTE], and will let my vote stand.

Mr. LOGAN (after having voted in the affirmative). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS], who is absent, and therefore I withdraw my vote.

Mr. KING (after having voted in the affirmative). I heretofore have voted, voting in the affirmative. I am now advised that I am paired for the day with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS]. I understand that if he were present he would vote "nay." I am therefore compelled to withdraw my vote.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER]. I inquire if that Senator has voted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That Senator has not voted.

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. Not knowing how he would vote, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] with the Senator fom Louisiana [Mr. LONG];

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT] with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON];

The Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN] with the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. BARKLEY];

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS];

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH]; and

The Senator from Maine [Mr. WHITE] with the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN].

Mr. HARRISON. I wish to announce that my colleague the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. STEPHENS] is necessarily out of the city. If present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have been requested to announce that the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH] are necessarily out of the city.

I also wish to announce that the senior Senator from Wyoming [Mr. KENDRICK] is detained by illness, and that the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON] is necessarily detained from the Senate on official business.

The result was announced—yeas 18, nays 52, as follows:

YEAS—18

Black	Cutting	Johnson	Nye
Blaine	Dill	McGill	Sheppard
Brookhart	Fletcher	McKellar	Shipstead
Bulow	Frazier	Neely
Costigan	George	Norris

NAYS—52

Ashurst	Borah	Carey	Dickinson
Austin	Broussard	Connally	Fess
Bailey	Bulkley	Coolidge	Glass
Bankhead	Byrnes	Copeland	Goldsborough
Barbour	Capper	Couzens	Gore
Bingham	Caraway	Dale	Hale
Harrison	Keyes	Reed	Townsend
Hatfield	McNary	Robinson, Ark.	Trammell
Hawes	Metcalf	Robinson, Ind.	Tydings
Hayden	Morrison	Schall	Vandenberg
Hull	Moses	Smith	Wagner
Jones	Oddie	Smoot	Walcott
Kean	Patterson	Steiwer	Watson

NOT VOTING—26

Barkley	Howell	Norbeck	Walsh, Mass.
Bratton	Kendrick	Pittman	Walsh, Mont.
Davis	King	Shortridge	Waterman
Glenn	La Follette	Stephens	Wheeler
Harris	Lewis	Swanson	White
Hastings	Logan	Thomas, Idaho
Hebert	Long	Thomas, Okla.

So Mr. BLAINE's amendment was rejected.

Mr. BARKLEY subsequently said: I wish to say that at the time of the roll call on the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. BLAINE] I was called from the Chamber temporarily and was unable to make an announcement. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN]. If at the time the roll was called on that amendment I had been present and permitted to vote, I should have voted "nay."

Mr. MORRISON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. On page 4, line 2, after the word "bank," it is proposed to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That advances so made to a member bank having a capital of over $2,000,000 shall not exceed 5 per cent of its total deposits.

And on page 4, line 3, after the word "Provided," to insert the word "further."

Mr. MORRISON. Mr. President, the purpose of the amendment is this: Under the bill reported by the committee as amended on the floor there will be some banks with a capital of over $2,000,000 which will not be able to enjoy the full provisions of the bill. I do not think that, however large or however small, any member bank of the Federal reserve system ought to be excluded from its provisions, and yet in the case of the large banks it seems to me there should be some limitation. Therefore this amendment seeks to provide that banks with over $2,000,000 capital may enjoy the provisions of this proposed law to the extent of 5 per cent of their total deposits.

It seems to me that this amendment ought to be adopted, because I do not think it is right to exclude the larger banks from the benefits of the proposed act merely on account of their size on any assumption that they might abuse it; and yet I think the limitation will guard against the fear that they might, on account of their size, abuse its provisions. Therefore it seems to me to adopt the amendment with the limitation suggested would be just and fair to the large banks.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I merely desire to say, in a word, that the amendment would enable some of the banks of the country to borrow as much as $65,000,000 from the Federal reserve banks; and if the provision of the bill to which the amendment applies was intended for the small banks, it would be disastrous to adopt this particular amendment. When we shall have gotten the bill into conference, if the $2,000,000 provision needs to be liberalized, there we may do it.

Mr. KEAN. Mr. President, it seems to me that the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina should be adopted, because all it does is to provide that banks may obtain some of the money which they have already deposited with the Federal reserve banks. It seems to me if one gentleman deposits $70 with another it is reasonable that he should at least receive $50 back. If the Senator from Virginia had some gold and would deposit that gold with me, I would be very glad to give him back $50 for every $70 he deposited. The member banks deposit 7 per cent of their deposits with the Federal reserve banks, which is the basis on which the Federal reserve banks live. It is a reasonable proposition, it seems, that they should be able to borrow at least 5 per cent of the amount so deposited.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, bankers of the description indicated can very easily get in under the group provision of this bill and not appropriate all the assets afforded to the smaller banks under the second provision of the bill. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina. [Putting the question.]

Mr. MORRISON. I ask for a division.

On a division, the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate on its second reading and open to further amendment.

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The CHIEF CLERK. At the end of the bill it is proposed to insert the following as a new section:

Sec. 4. The seventh paragraph of section 13 of the Federal reserve act, as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"Any Federal reserve bank may make advances to its member banks on their promissory notes for a period not exceeding 15 days at rates to be established by such Federal reserve banks, subject to the review and determination of the Federal Reserve Board, provided such promissory notes are secured by such first liens upon improved real estate, including improved farm lands, as are provided for in section 24 of this act, or by such notes, drafts, bills of exchange, or bankers' acceptances as are eligible for rediscount or for purchase by Federal reserve banks under the provisions of this act or by the deposit or pledge of bonds or notes of the United States."

Mr. SHIPSTEAD. Mr. President, let me in a few words explain the effect of the amendment. When the Federal reserve banking act was passed provision was made for national banks to make loans unon first liens on real estate including farm-land property. At that time I did not believe, and I do not now believe, that banks should tie up depositors' funds in long-term paper, but under the provisions of the law they have done so. The effect of this amendment will be to give that paper the privilege of being eligible for rediscount under the 15-day provision of the Federal reserve act. I think it would be helpful to a great many small banks in the various parts of the country which have taken advantage, if there is advantage, of loaning money on improved farm-land property and which now hold such paper, but in case of emergency can not use it with which to obtain money in the event there is a run upon the bank. Certainly such paper is as good as 90 per cent of the paper that is held by the banks of the country. Adoption of the amendment will give such farm paper the status for rediscount that it was given under the Federal reserve banking act, and would give it this eligible status along with other paper having the same privilege. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Minnesota on which the yeas and nays are demanded. Is there a second?

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate and open to amendment.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, in making amendments as to the time limit I overlooked one provision of the bill.

On page 5, line 14, beginning with the word "At," I move to strike out through the word "Act," in line 15, and insert "On March 3, 1933."

That is just in line with a few other amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, on yesterday I offered an amendment striking out the 1-year limitation. Instead of calling up that amendment later, I now move to amend the amendment of the Senator from Virginia by striking out the figures "1933" and inserting the figures "1934," which will have the effect of extending the limitation to two years instead of to one year.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Oklahoma to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. On that question I should like to have a record vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On that question the yeas and nays are demanded. Is the demand seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Chief Clerk proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. BROOKHART (when his name was called). I have a pair with the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. JONES (when his name was called). Announcing my pair as heretofore, I withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. KING (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Delaware [Mr. HASTINGS]. I understand that if he were present he would vote as I intend to vote. I therefore feel at liberty to vote and vote "nay."

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, may I be pardoned for interrupting the roll call to say that I understand there is a misunderstanding about the amendment that is being voted upon.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that the question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from Oklahoma to the amendment of the Senator from Virginia. The Senator from Virginia moved to insert the 3d of March, 1933, as the time of expiration of the operation of this section; and the Senator from Oklahoma moved to amend that amendment by making it the 3d of March, 1934. That is the question that is being voted on.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The question, then, is on the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oklahoma to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia.

The Chief Clerk resumed the calling of the roll.

Mr. LOGAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. DAVIS]. I am advised, however, that if he were present he would vote as I intend to vote. I therefore am at liberty to vote and vote "yea."

Mr. ODDIE (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with my colleague [Mr. PITTMAN]. If he were present I understand that he would vote "nay." If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER]. Not knowing how he would vote, I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma (when his name was called). On this question I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Illinois [Mr. GLENN]. Not knowing how he would vote, I shall have to withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. BARKLEY. I have a general pair with the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. WATERMAN]. I do not know how he would vote if present, and therefore I am compelled to withhold my vote. If at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON] is necessarily detained from the Senate on official business. I wish also to announce that the senior Senator from Alabama [Mr. BLACK] is necessarily detained from the Senate on official business.

Mr. FESS. I desire to announce the following general pairs:

The Senator from California [Mr. SHORTRIDGE] with the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. LONG];

The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. HEBERT] with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. BRATTON];

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HOWELL] with the Senator from Georgia [Mr. HARRIS]; and

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. NORBECK] with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WALSH].

The result was announced—yeas 46, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS—46

Austin	Costigan	Hayden	Robinson, Ind.
Bankhead	Couzens	Kean	Schall

So the amendment of Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma to Mr. GLASS's amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], as amended.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I do not know whether I should felicitate the Senate on the fact that it has adopted the psychology of the distinguished Secretary of the Treasury, who thinks that this emergency is going to continue for two years rather than one.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time?

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, from the tone of the letters I have received in my office I am convinced that no piece of legislation we have considered at this session will do more good and be more satisfying to the banking institutions of this country than this one, but I especially have in mind those located in the State of West Virginia.

Mr. President, I send to the desk a little memorandum which I ask unanimous consent to have incorporated in my remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, whose remarks are they?

Mr. HATFIELD. Mine. They are simply a description of the bill.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I understand that it has been the universal rule——

Mr. HATFIELD. I shall be very glad to read them into the RECORD.

Mr. BLAINE. I do not like to object, but I think it would be a bad practice to change the rule that has heretofore existed.

Mr. HATFIELD. As I say, I shall be very pleased to read them into the RECORD.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Please spare us that. Let them go into the RECORD.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be embodied in the RECORD at this point the remarks of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. HATFIELD. They are not remarks. They are simply a description of the bill, portraying what it will accomplish; that is all.

Mr. REED. That is what I mean.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the original request of the Senator from West Virginia to have been substantially that which is made in the course of the delivery of any speech during debate. That is to say, coming to a certain set of tables which a Senator has prepared, or coming to a synopsis of some article, or to some measure which the Senator himself has prepared, he asks to have it inserted in his remarks without reading. Under that situation, the Chair is of the opinion that it is quite in order for the request of the Senator from West Virginia to be granted.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I have no desire to make myself a nuisance; but I would rather be a nuisance than to create a situation and set a precedent under which Members of the Senate may make up a statement or argument as to the reasons why something should or should not be done and have it inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. HATFIELD. This is only a few pages, Mr. President.

Mr. BLAINE. If I may complete my statement, that is equivalent to making a speech. I think we ought to have the speech delivered in person. I know that I have enjoyed very much the remarks heretofore made by the Senator.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia will proceed.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, what happened to my request?

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. Mr. President, what is the regular order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in order for the Senator from West Virginia to proceed, as the Senator from Wisconsin has objected to the unanimous-consent request.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator from Wisconsin objected because of the unwritten rule of the Senate that no Senator shall extend his remarks in the RECORD.

The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent for the printing of the statement, and it is in order to submit that request.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understood the Senator from Wisconsin to have objected to that.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. I think not.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I assumed the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania was analogous to the request of the Senator from West Virginia.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. May I say to the Senator from Wisconsin that the rule never has been construed as extending to a request by one Senator for the incorporation of the remarks of another Senator? Every day that is done under the practice prevailing in the Senate.

Mr. HATFIELD. This is not a speech.

Mr. ROBINSON of Arkansas. The Senator could have read his remarks, however, within the time that has been taken in discussing the objection.

Mr. BLAINE. Mr. President, I am not going to object unless I am clearly within the general rule. If the speech the Senator has is one which he has heretofore delivered——

Mr. HATFIELD. It is not a speech.

Mr. BLAINE. I have no objection to the request of the Senator from Pennsylvania.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the Senator from Wisconsin to have withdrawn his objection?

Mr. BLAINE. I simply want my objection entered to the proposition that there may be an extension of remarks.

Mr. HATFIELD. It is not an extension of remarks.

Mr. REED. May the request be stated?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent that the analysis of the bill prepared by the Senator from West Virginia shall be incorporated in the RECORD in connection with the remarks which the Senator from West Virginia has already made. Is there objection?

Mr. DILL. I object.

Mr. HATFIELD. Mr. President, what are the conditions under which a bank may obtain an advance or credit from the Federal reserve bank of its district under the Glass bill?

The following conditions must be met by a bank in order to obtain a loan under this bill:

First. It must be a member of the Federal reserve system.

Second. It must have no eligible or acceptable assets which could be rediscounted at the Federal reserve bank unless they become members of a group.

Third. It must associate itself with four other banks.

Fourth. The other banks must agree to be liable for the loan in proportion as their deposits bear to the aggregate deposits of the group.

Fifth. A suitable trustee must be appointed for the entire group.

Sixth. Each bank in the group must give its individual note to the trustee.

Seventh. An amount of collateral security must be tendered to adequately secure the note.

Eighth. Approval of six members of the Federal Reserve Board of Washington must be obtained.

Ninth. The board of directors of the Federal reserve bank district must also agree upon the amount of the loan.

Tenth. The note must be in the form of a time or demand promissory note.

Eleventh. The five banks in the group must be independently owned and independently controlled banks.

Twelfth. The banks securing the loan must pay interest of at least 1 per cent above the discount rate of the Federal reserve district.

Thirteenth. No obligations of any foreign government, individual, partnership, association, or corporation organized under the laws thereof shall be eligible as collateral security for advances under this section.

Fourteenth. A promissory note given by the group of five banks for a loan can not be used as collateral security for Federal reserve notes.

The second feature of the Glass bill is somewhat similar in its provisions to the first, but it deals with smaller banks.

It provides that any member bank having a capital of $2,000,000 or less may obtain credit from the Federal reserve bank of its district, providing it has no eligible assets, under present regulations.

The promissory note of the bank will be taken providing it has an adequate security, and the note shall bear interest at least 1 per cent above the discount rate in effect in the district.

It appears that a small bank, no matter how small its capital may be, can borrow under provisions of this section if it has some assets which are acceptable to the Federal Reserve Board for this emergency period of one year. From the language of this section this extension of credit to small banks will continue until March 3, 1933, after the approval of the act.

The third big feature of the act is to permit the acceptance by the Federal Reserve Board of obligations of the United States, such as all forms of loan and bond issues sold by the Treasury, and of course, coming under this classification is the large number of Liberty loan bonds issued during the war, although some of them have been replaced by other forms of bonds at a lower rate of interest than the original bonds carried, and thus free a corresponding supply of gold which then becomes free gold.

In other words, the obligations of the United States are accepted in an indirect manner by the Federal reserve system. For example: A customer of a bank may obtain a loan of $10,000 by offering as security the same amount in Liberty loan bonds to a member bank with which he deals, and this member bank may present the note, providing it is prime commercial paper, to the Federal reserve bank of the district and obtain credit.

In the present bill an individual holding Government bonds can negotiate a loan through the Federal reserve system by securing credit at one of the member banks. Under section 3, however, the customer's bank may present the obligation of the United States directly to the Federal reserve bank of the district and obtain credit or cash, or use these obligations with 40 per cent in gold for an issue of Federal reserve currency.

Heretofore Federal reserve notes were based upon short time commercial paper (three months) and agricultural paper (nine months) and 40 per cent of the amount was in gold. Due to the absence of prime commercial paper during this depression, the member banks, instead of bringing to the Federal reserve bank 60 per cent in paper and 40 per cent in gold, have been bringing about 25 per cent in commercial paper and 75 per cent in gold. This, of course, ties up a large amount of the gold of the country, and it is to release this excess, sometimes called "free gold," that the last provision of the act is drawn.

In other words, the banks will then be able to bring to the Federal reserve bank, as security for an issue of Federal reserve notes, 40 per cent in gold and the balance, 60 per cent, to be a mixture, if they so desire, of commercial paper and obligations of the United States.

Never have the obligations of the United States been used as security for the issuance of Federal reserve notes. And while it may result in a mild inflation, its principal object is to release all of the gold over the 40 per cent for the issuance of the Federal reserve notes.

This released gold will in turn serve as credit or as an additional basis for another issue of Federal reserve notes if required.

France has approximately $450,000,000 in gold earmarked and $200,000,000 not earmarked in the New York banks. It is conjectured in some quarters that France is using this as a whip to affect the attitude of this Nation with respect to reparations and her indebtedness to the United States.

So to free ourselves of this gold without inconveniencing the credit system in New York, it is proposed to substitute for France's gold a large amount of the gold in the Federal reserve banks, and when this gold is withdrawn from the Federal reserve banks, there will in turn be substituted direct obligations of the United States.

In other words, there is more gold in the Federal reserve vaults as security for the currency issued by them than is necessary, and if for some of this gold we could substitute the obligations of the United States we would release this "free gold," thereby increase the credits and stabilize by our own credit and make ourselves independent of French gold in the banking system of the country.

I am very sorry, Mr. President, to have detained the Senate so long, but knowing the situation that exists in my State and in other sections of the country with which I am familiar, I am quite sure that each and every banker would like to know and to have at least a superficial interpretation of the bill that is soon to pass.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time?

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Mr. President, a few moments ago an amendment was adopted at one particular point changing the year from 1933 to 1934. I understood that the original amendment proposed to change each designation through the bill. If that is not true, I desire to ask unanimous consent that where the year 1933 is mentioned it be changed, in conformity with the amendment, to 1934.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request?

Mr. GLASS. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made.

Mr. THOMAS of Oklahoma. Then, Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. GLASS. To save time, I withdraw my objection.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have no intention of delaying the Senate. I should like to say, however, before I cast my vote, that I should be very glad to vote for this bill if it were confined to section 1 of the bill. I am unable to bring myself to believe that I should vote for sections 2 and 3, particularly section 3. I had intended to state at length my objection, particularly to the proviso in section 3, but it would serve no good purpose at this time to do so. I regard the proviso in section 3 as unnecessary and unsound. In addition it is a badge of fright, a sorry confession of weakness which this Government and this Nation ought not to make. It will be so interpreted abroad and do more harm than good. Had I time I would submit my views more at length.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time?

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This bill having been read three several times, the question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. FRAZIER. Mr. President, I want to explain my stand on the pending bill.

This is a bankers' bill. It is to give more power to the Federal Reserve Board. I am frank to say that, in my opinion, the Federal Reserve Board as it now functions, and as it has functioned for the last 10 or 12 years, has too much power under the present law.

Some of the proponents of the pending bill have stated that the bill is not for inflation; other proponents of the bill have stated that it means inflation. Some are going to vote for it because it does not mean inflation; some are going to vote for it because it means inflation. It is evident that the bill is going to pass, because Senators are going to vote for it regardless of what it means.

Mr. President, I think it is generally conceded that the Federal Reserve Board, under the present law, was responsible for the inflation of the currency during war time. That inflation was probably necessary. I believe it is also conceded that the Federal Reserve Board was responsible for the deflation which took place starting in 1920, which resulted in the breaking of literally hundreds of thousands of farmers throughout the United States.

I believe, too, that it is generally conceded that the Federal Reserve Board was responsible for the so-called stock and bond inflation, which culminated in 1929, which broke a great many more people. There is no question in my mind, and I do not think there is a question in the mind of any Senator on this floor, but that the Federal Reserve Board could have stopped that inflation on the stock and bond market in New York at any time; but they did not do it, and now in this bill we are asked to give the Federal Reserve Board more power, more power to a board, Mr. President, which has been more largely responsible for the present depressed conditions than all other factors put together.

In my estimation, this inflation starts at the wrong end entirely. Something must be done to restore the purchasing power of the farmer. Something must be done to restore the purchasing power of those who are unemployed by the millions to-day. That is what is going to bring about better times and not a bill of this kind, which will bring about an inflation of stocks and bonds.

Mr. President, when this bill was first mentioned in the newspapers a few days ago what was the result? Stocks and bonds on the New York market advanced immediately. It was conservatively estimated that the advance amounted to $5,000,000,000 within two or three days. Then they dropped back a little; why? Evidently some one here in Washington, or possibly in New York, gave out the word that they had better keep quiet a little while and not go quite so fast, but wait until the bill was passed before they boosted the stocks. The banks that have been talked about in the last few days are all loaded with stocks and bonds. They are carrying them at their purchase value instead of the real market value. If the bill is passed it will boost those stocks so that the banks can get out from under and unload those stocks and bonds at better prices and not lose so much money. Yes, Mr. President; it is a banker's bill. If that is what Senators want they should vote for it, of course, but in my estimation it will do the farmers no good. It will not prevent another orgy of stock gambling such as we have had during the past few years.

I have a bill pending before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry, Senate bill 1197, which will provide for putting into circulation a great deal of money through the medium of making loans to the farmers on real estate to enable them to liquidate their debts. I believe that bill is much more important than the one now before us, because it would bring more currency into circulation, starting with the farmers who need the money. It would accomplish more in that respect than the pending bill will. In fact, from the amendments which have been rejected here, it seems to me very doubtful whether or not this bill will be of any benefit to the farmers. It will not be of benefit to the rank and file of the people of the United States. I agree it will probably be of benefit to some of the big bankers.

Mr. GLASS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 9203) to improve the facilities of the Federal reserve system for the service of commerce, industry, and agriculture, to provide means for meeting the needs of member banks in exceptional circumstances, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to consider the bill.

Mr. GLASS. I move to strike out all after the enacting clause of the House bill now pending and to insert the text of Senate bill 3616, as amended by the Senate.

The motion was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. President, I move that the Senate insist upon its amendment, ask for a conference with the House, and that the Chair appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The motion was agreed to; and the Chair appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. WALCOTT, Mr. TOWNSEND, and Mr. GLASS.

EXERCISES ON WASHINGTON'S BIRTHDAY

Mr. WATSON. Mr. President, Monday being Washington's birthday, according to previous arrangements the Members of the Senate and the Members of the House are to meet in the Hall of the House of Representatives at 11.45 o'clock a. m. for the purpose of hearing an address by the President of the United States and such other exercises as may take place. Therefore, it is desirable that the Senate shall adjourn until Monday at 11.15 a. m. to proceed from here to the Hall of the House of Representatives. After the exercises shall have been concluded in the House the Senate will not return to its own Chamber, but may go home from the House of Representatives. The Farewell Address of George Washington is to be read in the Senate Tuesday at noon by the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH.] It is to be hoped that all Senators will be present Monday morning for the purpose of attending in a body the exercises in the Hall of the House of Representatives.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, may I inquire of the Senator from Indiana what will be our status after the exercises on Monday?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has understood that unanimous consent is to be requested that when the Senate concludes its business to-day it adjourn until Monday at 11.15 o'clock a. m., and that at the conclusion of the joint session in the Hall of the House of Representatives on Monday the Senate will stand in adjournment until 12 o'clock on Tuesday.

Mr. McNARY. I now submit the unanimous consent agreement just stated by the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the unanimous consent agreement proposed by the Senator from Oregon? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

SAFEGUARDING DEPOSITORS IN THE BANKING SYSTEM

Mr. FLETCHER. Mr. President, for some time I have been devoting considerable effort and study to the question of securing and safeguarding depositors in the banks of the country. I have prepared a rough draft of a bill looking to the protection of depositors in banks, restoring confidence, and giving all security. I referred that rough draft to the Hon. Robert L. Owen, formerly a Senator from the State of Oklahoma, for his opinion, because I know that he has kept in touch with public affairs, although he retired from the Senate voluntarily some years ago. At that time he was chairman of the Committee on Banking and Currency. He is well informed on this subject. He has replied by letter to me, and I ask that his reply may be inserted in the RECORD.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The letter is as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., February 18, 1932.

Hon. DUNCAN U. FLETCHER,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SENATOR: I thank you for a copy of your proposed bill for the safeguarding of the depositors in our banking system.

It will give me great pleasure to carefully examine the proposed measure and to make such suggestions as may occur to me as of interest.

The effect of this present collapse could have been and would have been obviated in large measure if there had been a nation-wide adequate insurance or guaranty of bank deposits.

The lack of this protection explains the withdrawal of money from the banks for hoarding, which is estimated at a minimum of $1,500,000,000. It probably is much larger, for out of our total of cash—$5,500,000,000—the member banks hold in the vaults less than $1,000,000,000, while everybody knows that currency is being hoarded on a colossal scale. I believe that more than half of the money in the hands of the people is hoarded; that is to say, over $2,000,000,000.

This is due to the fear of depositors of the safety of the bank deposits. There is further evidence of this in the nearly $400,000,000 of increase in the postal savings and over $1,000,000,000 increase in the deposits of mutual savings banks where the deposits are believed safe during 1930 and 1931.

The withdrawal of money for hoarding has alarmed the banks of the country, for they have less than $1,000,000,000 of cash in their vaults; and while there are liquid resources, so called, in the form of reserves in the reserve banks, United States bonds, and other quick assets, amounting to a huge sum, the banks, nevertheless, are, themselves, hoarding currency and refusing credit which normally they would be glad to furnish.

There are probably 35,000,000 depositors who need protection, who are entitled to protection, and whose protection by the banking system would be serviceable not only to the depositors and to the banks but, if adequately insured or guaranteed, would be a guaranty of stability to the business of the country. It would be a guaranty of stability to both the producer and consumer, and it would establish and maintain at a stable level the productive energies of the Nation. It would safeguard the manufacturers, the merchants, the railroads, the utilities, and every line of human endeavor down to the daily laborer. It would establish and maintain prosperity and a high standard of living.

PRINCIPLES OF INSURANCE

We insure human life on the basis of risk, based upon reports of actuaries, and the life-insurance companies have grown to gigantic figures of enormous value to the American people.

The same thing is true of fire insurance.

The actual loss of the national banks as registered by the Comptroller of the Currency (p. 35, last annual report) shows that only $55,000,000 have been lost to the depositors of the banks which have been liquidated up to this time, and the national banks have handled over four hundred billions of deposits during 66 years. The ascertained or estimated loss is less than one-sixtieth part of 1 per cent of annual average deposits. The banks could tax themselves a fraction of 1 per cent and absolutely safeguard every bank deposit.

I remind you, Senator, that the Federal reserve banks have paid the United States $167,000,000 franchise tax. They have paid their stockholders about $100,000,000. They have added to their reserves in profits over $250,000,000. Over $500,000,000 of profits, a fraction of these earnings, would be sufficient to make a dependable guaranty of every bank deposit.

The great number of bank failures during the last two years show that 86½ per cent are small banks, and even these bank failures are really all due directly or indirectly to the stock-market crash, which ought never to have occurred.

Assuredly, in the future this country can be protected against a repetition of the experience of 1929, just as foreign countries protect themselves against such experiences.

I set this matter up quite fully on February 25, 1908, in the Senate, and there I advocated making the guaranty bank deposits a part of the banking system and the credit destabilization due to stock-market gambling to which I respectfully call your attention.

The objection you will meet to the guaranty of bank deposits will be the unfounded theory that it would be too expensive.

My answer is it would be greatly profitable, would add billions to the deposits and to the earnings of the banks.

The Federal reserve banks should be required to guarantee the deposits of member banks, and the Government of the United States should underwrite this guaranty so as to convince the people beyond the possibility of a doubt that their money is safe in the banks and will be paid to them on demand.

Here are the foundation stones upon which the banking system should rest.

At present under the national bank act there is a partial guaranty of bank deposits to the extent of:

1. The capital of the bank.
2. The surplus of the bank.
3. The undivided profits of the bank. (The present capital, surplus, and profits of the national banks are $3,354,000,000, or security against about $19,000,000,000 of deposits.)
4. The stock of the bank in the reserve banks.
5. The reserves in the reserve banks.
6. The assets of the bank.
7. The safeguards provided by law requiring the banks to observe sound banking practice.
8. The safeguards provided by the rules of the Comptroller of the Currency and the examinations made by the bank examiners of the Comptroller; the examinations made by the examiners of the Federal reserve banks; the examinations made by examiners of the clearing houses in the various cities.
9. The fact that the president of the bank, his directors, and his officials would be discredited if the bank should fail under their management.

A life-insurance company requires an examination of the individual to see that he is in good health and of good character and of good habits.

The fire-insurance companies require examination of the house insured to see that it is a safe risk.

In the same way, under a system of insuring bank deposits, the reserve banks should be given power to safeguard adequately their insurance of a bank and to impose conditions under which the insurance shall apply, and thus more completely safeguard the insurer as well as the depositors of the bank by adding to the security of the banks through an adequate administration of such bank.

It should be remembered that while this proposed reform applies to nearly 40,000,000 people, who are the backbone of this country and who have $56,000,000,000 of deposits, the guaranty bank deposit means much more than protecting of the depositors of the bank.

It means protecting the national industrial life, stability of business, stabilizing commodity values, stabilizing employment and wages, stabilizing the business of manufacturers, merchants, railroads, public utilities, professional men, labor unions, the farmers and stock raisers, and every line of human endeavor. It means stabilizing incomes of individuals, of corporations, and even of the National Government. It means bringing our national income back to normal. It was $90,000,000,000 in 1928 and 1929. It is $60,000,000,000 now. Surely an increase of $30,000,000,000 of national income is worth fighting for.

It means keeping the industrial energies of America uniformly employed at maximum efficiency. It means protecting and advancing high standards of living, the health, the wealth, and the happiness of the American people.

I rejoice to see that you have determined to present this reform of our banking system to the American people, and I only regret that I did not have the capacity to make more effective the arguments which I presented in 1908 when I first entered the Senate.

You will meet with the plea that this system would encourage reckless banking.

Properly written, the law, with its safeguards, would guarantee the opposite.

You will meet with the charge that the system of guaranty bank deposits failed in Oklahoma, Nebraska, and other places.

The answer to this is these systems were inherently weak, based on a guaranty fund, not administered by the banks themselves but by transitory political appointees and in which the banks were divided in opinion. The banks that were well conducted were taxed unfairly by banks that had no capital adequate to meet their overhead or to protect their depositors when any unusual occurrence took place.

Properly analyzed, you will find that these objections are not sufficient to justify an argument against a sound system properly administered.

There is a great interest in this matter, but it will be necessary to build up public opinion in order that representatives in Congress may realize that the country itself will approve, and that it desires, a sound system that will make the bank deposits absolutely safe.

I shall take pleasure in cooperating to the extent of my limited opportunities.

Yours respectfully, ROBERT L. OWEN.

AGRICULTURAL CREDIT CORPORATIONS

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate House Joint Resolution 292.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate a joint resolution from the House of Representatives, which will be read.

The joint resolution (H. J. Res. 292) to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to aid in the establishment of agricultural-credit corporations, and for other purposes, was read the first time by title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of Agriculture is hereby authorized to make advances or loans to individuals, under such regulations as he may prescribe, for the purpose of assisting in forming local agricultural-credit corporations, livestock-loan companies, or like organizations, or of increasing the capital stock of such corporations, companies, or organizations qualified to do business with Federal intermediate credit banks or to which such privileges may be extended.

SEC. 2. (a) No loans shall be made to individual stockholders on the capital stock of, or to create or increase the capital stock of, such corporation, company, or organization in an amount in excess of 75 per cent of the par value of the capital stock of such corporation, company, or organization owned by or proposed to be subscribed to by such individual, nor unless such individual shall submit a credit statement (in such form as the Secretary of Agriculture may prescribe) which shall be verified by the investigation of the Secretary of Agriculture and shall show that such individual is not indebted in an amount in excess of one-half of the fair market value of his assets and that the value of such assets above such indebtedness shall be at least twice the value of the loan applied for; nor shall any loan be made to any individual on the capital stock of, or to create or to increase the capital stock of, any corporation devoted mainly to the financing and/or sale of special products to farmers.

(b) No loan shall be made upon the capital stock of any corporation until the Secretary of Agriculture shall find that the financial structure of such corporation is sound and unimpaired and by him approved, nor shall any loan be made upon the capital stock of such corporation until the management of such company shall be made known to and approved by the Secretary, and the Secretary shall have the right at any time to declare the indebtedness to the Government that may be created hereunder due whenever in his judgment the financial structure of the corporation shall become so impaired or the management become so unsatisfactory as to jeopardize the interests of the Government.

SEC. 3. No loan or advance shall be made to any individual upon the capital stock or, or to create or increase the capital stock of, any corporation, unless the paid-in capital stock of such corporation shall be at least $10,000.

SEC. 4. To carry out the provisions of this resolution, including all expenses incurred thereunder, there are authorized to be appropriated, out of the unexpended balances of appropriations made to carry out the provisions of Public Resolution No. 112, Seventy-first Congress (46 Stat. 1032), as amended by the Interior Department appropriation act for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1932, and as amended by Public Resolution No. 120 (46 Stat. 1167), and out of the collections from loans made under Public Resolution No. 112, as so amended, a sum not exceeding $10,000,000, which sum shall be paid into a revolving fund. Not to exceed 2 per cent of such funds may be used for expenses of administration. All moneys received from time to time upon the repayment of any advance or loan made pursuant to this act, together with the interest, shall be paid into the revolving fund and shall thereafter be available for the purposes and in the manner hereinbefore provided.

Mr. GEORGE. Mr. President, last calendar the Senate considered the subject matter covered by the House joint resolution and dealt with the same subject matter. It passed the bill (S. 1567) establishing a revolving fund, to be administered by the Secretary of Agriculture, for agricultural-credit purposes, a bill varying only in certain minor particulars from the House joint resolution. The Senate bill has gone to the House. The House on the same day acted and sent this joint resolution to the Senate. I move that the Senate proceed to its consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GEORGE. I move that all after the resolving clause in the House joint resolution be stricken out and that the text of the Senate bill, S. 1567, the bill passed by the Senate on Wednesday of this week, be substituted in lieu thereof.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion proposed by the Senator from Georgia.

The motion was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time and passed, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $10,000,000, to be immediately available and to constitute a revolving fund, to be administered by the Secretary of Agriculture, and to be known as the agricultural credit fund, for the purpose of making advances or loans to individuals for forming such local agricultural credit corporations, livestock loan companies, or like organizations as are now or may hereafter be qualified to do business with Federal intermediate credit banks and of increasing the capital stock of such corporations, companies, or organizations, and, in the discretion of the Secretary of Agriculture, of making advances or loans direct to such corporations, companies, or organizations, upon such security as he may deem adequate. The advances and loans from the revolving fund shall be made upon such terms and conditions as the Secretary of Agriculture may prescribe; except that the advances and loans to any such corporation, company, or organization outstanding at any time shall not exceed 50 per cent of the capital stock thereof. All amounts received upon the repayment of any advance or loan made pursuant to this act shall be paid into the revolving fund and shall become a part thereof until July 1, 1934.

Mr. GEORGE. I now move that the Senate insist upon its amendment and ask a conference with the House of Representatives and the Chair appoint conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, may I ask what is the subject matter of the bill?

Mr. GEORGE. It is a bill setting up a fund to aid in the formation of credit corporations, the bill which the Senate passed on Wednesday last.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Georgia.

The motion was agreed to; and the President pro tempore appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. McNARY, Mr. NORRIS, and Mr. SMITH.

ISABELLE FREEMAN BELL

Mr. SMITH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate Resolution 148, submitted by me on January 27.

There being no objection, the resolution was read, considered, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate hereby is authorized and directed to pay from the appropriation for miscellaneous items, contingent fund of the Senate, fiscal year 1931, to Isabelle Freeman Bell, widow of Samuel A. Bell, late a skilled laborer of the Senate under supervision of the Sergeant at Arms, a sum equal to six months' compensation at the rate he was receiving by law at the time of his death, said sum to be considered inclusive of funeral expenses and all other allowances.

EXECUTIVE SESSION

Mr. McNARY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

EXECUTIVE MESSAGES REFERRED

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate several messages from the President of the United States submitting nominations, which were referred to the appropriate committees.

(For nominations this day received see the end of Senate proceedings.)

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Reports of committees are in order.

Mr. ODDIE, from the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, reported favorably sundry nominations of postmasters.

Mr. SCHALL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported favorably the nomination of Gregory H. Frederick, of Michigan, to be United States attorney, eastern district of Michigan.

Mr. REED, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported favorably the nomination of Second Lieut. Walter Edgerton Johns, Cavalry, for appointment, by transfer, to the Field Artillery.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The nominations will be placed on the calendar.

THE CALENDAR—TREATIES

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read Calendar No. 5, Executive KK (70th Cong., 2d sess.), a treaty of friendship, commerce, and consular rights between the United States and Norway, signed at Washington on June 5, 1928, and an additional article thereto signed at Washington on February 25, 1929.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, this treaty and the next one on the calendar may be postponed at the request of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Calendars Nos. 5 and 7, at the request of the Senator from Montana, will be postponed.

EXTRADITION TREATY WITH GREECE

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read Calendar No. 8, Executive D (72d Cong., 1st sess.), a treaty between the United States and Greece for the extradition of fugitives from justice, signed at Athens on May 6, 1931, which was considered as in Committee of the Whole and is as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

To the end that I may receive the advice and consent of the Senate for ratification, I transmit herewith a treaty between the United States and Greece for the extradition of fugitives from justice, signed at Athens on May 6, 1931.

HERBERT HOOVER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 5, 1932.

The PRESIDENT:

The undersigned, the Secretary of State, has the honor to lay before the President, with a view to its transmission to the Senate, to receive the advice and consent of that body to ratification, if his judgment approve thereof, a treaty for the extradition of fugitives from justice, signed by the plenipotentiaries of the United States and Greece at Athens on May 6, 1931.

Respectfully submitted.

HENRY L. STIMSON.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, February 4, 1932.

TREATY OF EXTRADITION BETWEEN THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND THE HELLENIC REPUBLIC

The United States of America and Greece, desiring to promote the cause of justice, have resolved to conclude a treaty for the extradition of fugitives from justice between the two countries and have appointed for that purpose the following Plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States of America: Mr. Robert Peet Skinner, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States of America at Athens; and

The President of the Hellenic Republic: Mr. Andreas Michalakopoulos, Vice President of the Government, Minister for Foreign Affairs;

Who, after having communicated to each other their respective full powers, found to be in good and due form, have agreed upon and concluded the following articles:

ARTICLE I

It is agreed that the Government of the United States and the Government of Greece shall, upon requisition duly made as herein provided, deliver up to justice any person, who may be charged with, or may have been convicted of, any of the crimes or offenses specified in Article II of the Present Treaty committed within the jurisdiction of one of the High Contracting Parties, and who shall seek an asylum or shall be found within the territories of the other; provided that such surrender shall take place only upon such evidence of criminality, as according to the laws of the place where the fugitive or person so charged shall be found, would justify his apprehension and commitment for trial if the crime or offense had been there committed.

ARTICLE II

Persons shall be delivered up according to the provisions of the present Treaty, who shall have been charged with or convicted of any of the following crimes or offenses:

1. Murder (including crimes designated by the terms parricide, poisoning, infanticide, manslaughter, when voluntary).

2. Malicious wounding or inflicting grievous bodily harm with premeditation.

3. Rape, abortion, carnal knowledge of children under the age of 15 years.

4. Abduction or detention of women or girls for immoral purposes.

5. Bigamy.

6. Arson.

7. Willful and unlawful destruction or obstruction of railroads, which endangers human life.

8. Crimes committed at sea:

(a) Piracy, as commonly known and defined by the law of nations, or by statutes:

(b) Wrongfully sinking or destroying a vessel at sea or attempting to do so;

(c) Mutiny or conspiracy by two or more members of the crew or other persons on board of a vessel on the high seas, for the purpose of rebelling against the authority of the Captain or Commander of such vessel, or by fraud or violence taking possession of such vessel;

(d) Assault on board ship upon the high seas with intent to do bodily harm.

9. Burglary.

10. The act of breaking into and entering the offices of the Government and public authorities, or the offices of banks, banking houses, savings banks, trust companies, or other buildings not dwellings with intent to commit a felony therein.

11. Robbery.

12. Forgery or the utterance of forged papers.

13. The forgery or falsification of the official acts of the Government or public authority, including Courts of Justice, or the uttering or fraudulent use of any of the same.

14. The fabrication of counterfeit money, whether coin or paper, counterfeit titles or coupons of public debt, created by National, State, Provincial, Territorial, Local or Municipal Governments, bank notes or other instruments of public credit, counterfeit seals, stamps, dies and marks of State or public administrations, and the utterance, circulation or fraudulent use of the above mentioned objects.

15. Embezzlement or criminal malversation committed within the jurisdiction of one or the other party by public officers or depositaries, where the amount embezzled exceeds two hundred dollars or Greek equivalent.

16. Embezzlement by any person hired, salaried, or employed, to the detriment of their employers or principals, when the crime or offense is punishable by imprisonment or other corporal punishment by the laws of both countries, and where the amount embezzled exceeds two hundred dollars or Greek equivalent.

17. Kidnapping of minors or adults, defined to be the abduction or detention of a person or persons, in order to exact money from them, their families or any other person or persons, or for any other unlawful end.

18. Larceny, defined to be the theft of effects, personal property, or money, of the value of twenty-five dollars or more, or Greek equivalent.

19. Obtaining money, valuable securities or other property by false pretenses, or receiving any money, valuable securities or other property knowing the same to have been unlawfully obtained, where the amount of money or the value of the property so obtained or received exceeds two hundred dollars or Greek equivalent.

20. Perjury.

21. Fraud or breach of trust by a bailee, banker, agent, factor, trustee, executor, administrator, guardian, director or officer of any company or corporation, or by any one in any fiduciary position, where the amount of money or the value of the property misappropriated exceeds two hundred dollars or Greek equivalent.

22. Crimes and offenses against the laws of both countries for the suppression of slavery and slave trading.

23. Wilful desertion or wilful non-support of minor or dependent children, or of other dependent persons, provided that the crime or offense is punishable by the laws of both countries.

24. Bribery.

25. Crimes or offenses against the bankruptcy laws.

26. Crimes or offenses against the laws for the suppression of traffic in narcotics.

27. Extradition shall also take place for participation in any of the crimes or offenses before mentioned as an accessory before or after the fact, or in any attempt to commit any of the aforesaid crimes or offenses. However, extradition for participation or attempt will be accorded in the case of a suspected person only if the maximum of the possible punishment is two years or more, and, in the case of one condemned, only if the sentence pronounced by the jurisdiction of the demanding State is six months or more.

ARTICLE III

The provisions of the present Treaty shall not import a claim of extradition for any crime or offense of a political character, nor for acts connected with such crimes or offenses; and no person surrendered by or to either of the High Contracting Parties in virtue of this Treaty shall be tried or punished for a political crime or offense committed before his extradition. The State applied to, or courts of such State, shall decide whether the crime or offense is of a political character. When the offense charged comprises the act either of murder or assassination or of poisoning, either consummated or attempted, the fact that the offense was committed or attempted against the life of the Sovereign or Head of a foreign State, or against the life of any member of his family, shall not be deemed sufficient to sustain that such crime or offense was of a political character; or was an act connected with crimes or offenses of a political character.

ARTICLE IV

No person shall be tried for any crime or offense, committed prior to his extradition, other than that for which he was surrendered, unless he has been at liberty for one month after having been tried, to leave the country, or, in case of conviction, for one month after having suffered his punishment or having been pardoned.

ARTICLE V

A fugitive criminal shall not be surrendered under the provisions hereof, when, from lapse of time or other lawful cause, according to the laws of either of the surrendering or the demanding country, the criminal is exempt from prosecution or punishment for the offense for which the surrender is asked.

ARTICLE VI

If a fugitive criminal whose surrender may be claimed pursuant to the stipulations hereof, be actually under prosecution, out on bail or in custody, for a crime or offense committed in the country where he has sought asylum, or shall have been convicted thereof, his extradition may be deferred until such proceedings be determined, and until he shall have been set at liberty in due course of law.

ARTICLE VII

If a fugitive criminal claimed by one of the two parties hereto, shall be also claimed by one or more powers pursuant to treaty provisions, on account of crimes or offenses committed within their jurisdiction, such criminal shall be delivered to that State whose demand is first received unless the demand is waived.

This article shall not affect such treaties as have previously been concluded by one of the contracting parties with other States.

ARTICLE VIII

Under the stipulations of this Treaty, neither of the High Contracting Parties shall be bound to deliver up its own citizens, except in cases where such citizenship has been obtained after the perpetration of the crime for which extradition is sought. The State appealed to shall decide whether the person claimed is its own citizen.

ARTICLE IX

The expense of transportation of the fugitive shall be borne by the government which has preferred the demand for extradition. The appropriate legal officers of the country where the proceedings of extradition are had, shall assist the officers of the government demanding the extradition before the respective judges and magistrates, by every legal means within their power; and no claim other than for the board and lodging of a fugitive prior to his surrender, arising out of the arrest, detention, examination and surrender of fugitives under this treaty, shall be made against the government demanding the extradition; provided, however, that any officer or officers of the surrendering government giving assistance, who shall, in the usual course of their duty receive no salary or compensation other than specific fees for services performed, shall be entitled to receive from the government demanding the extradition the customary fees for the acts or services performed by them in the same manner and to the same amount as though such acts or services had been performed in ordinary criminal proceedings under the laws of the country of which they are officers.

ARTICLE X

Everything found in the possession of the fugitive criminal at the time of his arrest, whether being the proceeds of the crime or offense, or which may be material as evidence in making proof of the crime, shall so far as practicable, according to the laws of either of the High Contracting Parties, be delivered up with his person at the time of surrender. Nevertheless, the rights of a third party with regard to the articles referred to, shall be duly respected.

ARTICLE XI

The stipulations of the present Treaty shall be applicable to all territory wherever situated, belonging to either of the High Contracting Parties or in the occupancy and under the control of either of them, during such occupancy or control.

Requisitions for the surrender of fugitives from justice shall be made by the respective diplomatic agents of the High Contracting Parties. In the event of the absence of such agents from the country or where extradition is sought from territory included in the preceding paragraphs, other than the United States or Greece, requisitions may be made by superior consular officers.

The arrest of the fugitive shall be brought about in accordance with the laws of the respective countries, and if, after an examination, it shall be decided, according to the law and the evidence, that extradition is due pursuant to this treaty, the fugitive shall be surrendered in conformity to the forms of law prescribed in such cases.

The person provisionally arrested, shall be released, unless within two months from the date of arrest in Greece, or from the date of commitment in the United States, the formal requisition for surrender with the documentary proofs hereinafter prescribed be made as aforesaid by the diplomatic agent of the demanding Government, or, in his absence, by a consular officer thereof.

If the fugitive criminal shall have been convicted of the crime or offense for which his surrender is asked, a copy of the sentence of the court before which such conviction took place, duly authenticated, shall be produced. If, however, the fugitive is merely charged with crime, a duly authenticated copy of the warrant of arrest in the country where the crime was committed, and of the depositions upon which such warrant may have been issued, shall be produced, with such other evidence or proof as may be deemed competent in the case.

ARTICLE XII

The present Treaty, of which the English and Greek texts are equally authentic, shall be ratified by the High Contracting Parties in accordance with their respective constitutional methods, and shall take effect on the date of the exchange of ratifications which shall take place at Washington as soon as possible.

ARTICLE XIII

The present Treaty shall remain in force for a period of five years, and in case neither of the High Contracting Parties shall have given notice one year before the expiration of that period of its intention to terminate the Treaty, it shall continue in force until the expiration of one year from the date on which such notice of termination shall be given by either of the High Contracting Parties.

In witness whereof the above named Plenipotentiaries have signed the present Treaty and have hereunto affixed their seals.

Done in duplicate at Athens this sixth day of May, nineteen hundred and thirty-one.

[SEAL.] ROBERT P. SKINNER.

[SEAL.] ANDREAS MICHALAKOPOULOS.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, this and the subsequent treaty with Great Britain are extradition treaties and are in the usual terms of our extradition treaties, covering practically the same, and I think entirely the same, list of crimes. Political refugees are excepted from the operation of the treaty. In view of the many treaties of a similar import and like terms it seems unnecessary to go into details.

The treaty was reported to the Senate without amendment, and the resolution of ratification was read, as follows:

Resolved (two-thirds of the Senators present concurring therein), That the Senate advise and consent to the ratification of Executive D, Seventy-second Congress, first session, a treaty between the United States and Greece for the extradition of fugitives from justice, signed at Athens on May 6, 1931.

The resolution was agreed to, two-thirds of the Senators present voting in the affirmative.

EXTRADITION TREATY WITH GREAT BRITAIN

The Chief Clerk proceeded to read Calendar No. 8, Executive E (72d Cong., 1st sess.), a treaty for the extradition of fugitives from justice, signed by the plenipotentiaries of the United States and His Majesty the King of Great Britain, Ireland, and the British Dominions beyond the Seas, Emperor of India, at London, on December 22, 1931, and agreements by two exchanges of notes to make the treaty applicable also to Palestine and Transjordan, respectively, which was considered as in Committee of the Whole and is as follows:

To the Senate of the United States:

To the end that I may receive the advice and consent of the Senate to ratification, I transmit herewith a treaty for the extradition of fugitives from justice, signed by the plenipotentiaries of the United States and His Majesty the King of Great Britain, Ireland, and the British Dominions beyond the Seas, Emperor of India, at London, on December 22, 1931, and agreements by two exchanges of notes to make the treaty applicable also to Palestine and Transjordan, respectively.

Accompanying the treaty is a report by the Secretary of State, to which the attention of the Senate is invited.

HERBERT HOOVER.

THE WHITE HOUSE, February 5, 1932.

The PRESIDENT:

The undersigned, the Secretary of State, has the honor to lay before the President, with a view to its transmission to the Senate to receive the advice and consent of that body to ratification, if his judgment approve thereof, a treaty signed at London on December 22, 1931, by the plenipotentiaries of the United States of America and His Majesty the King of Great Britain, Ireland, and the British Dominions beyond the Seas, Emperor of India, for the extradition of persons accused or convicted of any of the crimes or offenses enumerated therein committed within the jurisdiction of the United States or Great Britain, who shall be found within the territory of the other party.

The treaty is open to subsequent adherence on the part of the several self-governing dominions of His Britannic Majesty and India.

As between the United States and the territory of His Britannic Majesty to which the present treaty is made applicable, the provisions of article 10 of the treaty of August 9, 1842, the extradition convention of July 12, 1889, the supplementary extradition convention of December 13, 1900, and the supplementary extradition convention of April 12, 1905, between the two Governments shall cease to have effect on the coming into force of the present treaty. These conventions, however, remain in force in respect of the self-governing dominions and India until they shall have adhered to the present treaty or entered into other treaty arrangements with the United States concerning extradition.

There are also submitted copies of two exchanges of notes by which it is agreed that on the coming into force of this convention its provisions shall be applicable to Palestine and Transjordan, respectively.

Respectfully submitted.

HENRY L. STIMSON.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, February 4, 1932.

THE President of the United States of America.

And His Majesty the King of Great Britain, Ireland and the British Dominions beyond the Seas, Emperor of India;

Desiring to make more adequate provision for the reciprocal extradition of criminals,

Have resolved to conclude a Treaty for that purpose, and to that end have appointed as their plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States of America:

General Charles G. Dawes, Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of the United States of America at the Court of St. James;

And His Majesty the King of Great Britain, Ireland and the British Dominions beyond the Seas, Emperor of India;

for Great Britain and Northern Ireland:

The Right Honourable Sir John Simon, G.C.S.I., M.P., His Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs:

who, having communicated their full powers, found in good and due form, have agreed as follows:

ARTICLE 1

The High Contracting Parties engage to deliver up to each other, under certain circumstances and conditions stated in the present Treaty, those persons who, being accused or convicted of any of the crimes or offences enumerated in Article 3, committed within the jurisdiction of the one Party, shall be found within the territory of the other Party.

ARTICLE 2

For the purposes of the present Treaty the territory of His Britannic Majesty shall be deemed to be Great Britain and Northern Ireland, the Channel Islands and the Isle of Man, and all parts of His Britannic Majesty's dominions overseas other than those enumerated in Article 14, together with the territories enumerated in Article 16 and any territories to which it may be extended under Article 17. It is understood that in respect of all territory of His Britannic Majesty as above defined other than Great Britain and Northern Ireland, the Channel Islands, and the Isle of Man, the present Treaty shall be applied so far as the laws permit.

For the purposes of the present Treaty the territory of the United States shall be deemed to be all territory wherever situated belonging to the United States, including its dependencies and all other territories under its exclusive administration or control.

ARTICLE 3

Extradition shall be reciprocally granted for the following crimes or offenses:

1. Murder (including assassination, parricide, infanticide, poisoning), or attempt or conspiracy to murder.
2. Manslaughter.
3. Administering drugs or using instruments with intent to procure the miscarriage of women.
4. Rape.
5. Unlawful carnal knowledge, or any attempt to have unlawful carnal knowledge, of a girl under 16 years of age.
6. Indecent assault if such crime or offence be indictable in the place where the accused or convicted person is apprehended.
7. Kidnapping or false imprisonment.
8. Child stealing, including abandoning, exposing or unlawfully detaining.
9. Abduction.
10. Procuration: that is to say the procuring or transporting of a woman or girl under age, even with her consent, for immoral purposes, or of a woman or girl over age, by fraud, threats, or compulsion, for such purposes with a view in either case to gratifying the passions of another person provided that such crime or offence is punishable by imprisonment for at least one year or by more severe punishment.
11. Bigamy.
12. Maliciously wounding or inflicting grievous bodily harm.
13. Threats, by letter or otherwise, with intent to extort money or other things of value.
14. Perjury, or subornation of perjury.
15. Arson.

16. Burglary or housebreaking, robbery with violence, larceny or embezzlement.

17. Fraud by a bailee, banker, agent, factor, trustee, director, member, or public officer of any company, or fraudulent conversion.

18. Obtaining money, valuable security, or goods, by false pretences receiving any money, valuable security, or other property, knowing the same to have been stolen or unlawfully obtained.

19. (a) Counterfeiting or altering money, or bringing into circulation counterfeited or altered money. (b) Knowingly and without lawful authority making or having in possession any instrument, tool, or engine adapted and intended for the counterfeiting of coin.

20. Forgery, or uttering what is forged.

21. Crimes or offences against bankruptcy law.

22. Bribery, defined to be the offering, giving or receiving of bribes.

23. Any malicious act done with intent to endanger the safety of any persons travelling or being upon a railway.

24. Crimes or offences or attempted crimes or offences in connection with the traffic in dangerous drugs.

25. Malicious injury to property, if such crime or offence be indictable.

26. (a) Piracy by the law of nations. (b) Revolt, or conspiracy to revolt, by two or more persons on board a ship on the high seas against the authority of the master; wrongfully sinking or destroying a vessel at sea, or attempting to do so; assaults on board a ship on the high seas, with intent to do grievous bodily harm.

27. Dealing in slaves.

Extradition is also to be granted for participation in any of the aforesaid crimes or offences, provided that such participation be punishable by the laws of both High Contracting Parties.

ARTICLE 4

The extradition shall not take place if the person claimed has already been tried and discharged or punished, or is still under trial in the territories of the High Contracting Party applied to, for the crime or offence for which his extradition is demanded.

If the person claimed should be under examination or under punishment in the territories of the High Contracting Party applied to for any other crime or offence, his extradition shall be deferred until the conclusion of the trial and the full execution of any punishment awarded to him.

ARTICLE 5

The extradition shall not take place if, subsequently to the commission of the crime or offence or the institution of the penal prosecution or the conviction thereon, exemption from prosecution or punishment has been acquired by lapse of time, according to the laws of the High Contracting Party applying or applied to.

ARTICLE 6

A fugitive criminal shall not be surrendered if the crime or offence in respect of which his surrender is demanded is one of a political character, or if he proves that the requisition for his surrender has, in fact, been made with a view to try or punish him for a crime or offence of a political character.

ARTICLE 7

A person surrendered can in no case be kept in custody or be brought to trial in the territories of the High Contracting Party to whom the surrender has been made for any other crime or offence, or on account of any other matters, than those for which the extradition shall have taken place, until he has been restored, or has had an opportunity of returning, to the territories of the High Contracting Party by whom he has been surrendered.

This stipulation does not apply to crimes or offences committed after the extradition.

ARTICLE 8

The extradition of fugitive criminals under the provisions of this Treaty shall be carried out in the United States and in the territory of His Britannic Majesty respectively, in conformity with the laws regulating extradition for the time being in force in the territory from which the surrender of the fugitive criminal is claimed.

ARTICLE 9

The extradition shall take place only if the evidence be found sufficient, according to the laws of the High Contracting Party applied to, either to justify the committal of the prisoner for trial, in case the crime or offence had been committed in the territory of such High Contracting Party, or to prove that the prisoner is the identical person convicted by the courts of the High Contracting Party who makes the requisition, and that the crime or offence of which he has been convicted is one in respect of which extradition could, at the time of such conviction, have been granted by the High Contracting Party applied to.

ARTICLE 10

If the individual claimed by one of the High Contracting Parties in pursuance of the present Treaty should be also claimed by one or several other Powers on account of other crimes or offences committed within their respective jurisdictions, his extradition shall be granted to the Power whose claim is earliest in date, unless such claim is waived.

ARTICLE 11

If sufficient evidence for the extradition be not produced within two months from the date of the apprehension of the fugitive, or within such further time as the High Contracting Party applied to, or the proper tribunal of such High Contracting Party, shall direct, the fugitive shall be set at liberty.

ARTICLE 12

All articles seized which were in the possession of the person to be surrendered at the time of his apprehension, and any articles that may serve as a proof of the crime or offence shall be given up when the extradition takes place, in so far as this may be permitted by the law of the High Contracting Party granting the extradition.

ARTICLE 13

All expenses connected with the extradition shall be borne by the High Contracting Party making the application.

ARTICLE 14

His Britannic Majesty may accede to the present Treaty on behalf of any of his Dominions hereafter named—that is to say, the Dominion of Canada, the Commonwealth of Australia (including for this purpose Papua and Norfolk Island), the Dominion of New Zealand, the Union of South Africa, the Irish Free State, and Newfoundland—and India. Such accession shall be effected by a notice to that effect given by the appropriate diplomatic representative of His Majesty at Washington which shall specify the authority to which the requisition for the surrender of a fugitive criminal who has taken refuge in the Dominion concerned, or India, as the case may be, shall be addressed. From the date when such notice comes into effect the territory of the Dominion concerned or of India shall be deemed to be territory of His Britannic Majesty for the purposes of the present Treaty.

The requisition for the surrender of a fugitive criminal who has taken refuge in any of the above-mentioned Dominions or India, on behalf of which His Britannic Majesty has acceded, shall be made by the appropriate diplomatic or consular officer of the United States of America.

Either High Contracting Party may terminate this Treaty separately in respect of any of the above-mentioned Dominions or India. Such termination shall be effected by a notice given in accordance with the provisions of Article 18.

Any notice given under the first paragraph of this Article in respect of one of His Britannic Majesty's Dominions may include any territory in respect of which a mandate on behalf of the League of Nations has been accepted by His Britannic Majesty, and which is being administered by the Government of the Dominion concerned; such territory shall, if so included, be deemed to be territory of His Britannic Majesty for the purposes of the present Treaty. Any notice given under the third paragraph of this Article shall be applicable to such mandated territory.

ARTICLE 15

The requisition for the surrender of a fugitive criminal who has taken refuge in any territory of His Britannic Majesty other than Great Britain and Northern Ireland, the Channel Islands, or the Isle of Man, or the Dominions or India mentioned in Article 14, shall be made to the Governor, or chief authority, of such territory by the appropriate consular officer of the United States of America.

Such requisition shall be dealt with by the competent authorities of such territory: provided, nevertheless, that if an order for the committal of the fugitive criminal to prison to await surrender shall be made, the said Governor or chief authority may, instead of issuing a warrant for the surrender of such fugitive, refer the matter to His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland.

ARTICLE 16

This Treaty shall apply in the same manner as if they were Possessions of His Britannic Majesty to the following British Protectorates, that is to say, the Bechuanaland Protectorate, Gambia Protectorate, Kenya Protectorate, Nigeria Protectorate, Northern Rhodesia, Northern Territories of the Gold Coast, Nyasaland, Sierra Leone Protectorate, Solomon Islands Protectorate, Somaliland Protectorate, Swaziland, Uganda Protectorate and Zanzibar, and to the following territories in respect of which a mandate on behalf of the League of Nations has been accepted by His Britannic Majesty, that is to say, Cameroons under British mandate, Togoland under British mandate, and the Tanganyika Territory.

ARTICLE 17

If after the signature of the present Treaty it is considered advisable to extend its provisions to any British Protectorates other than those mentioned in the preceding Article or to any British-protected State, or to any territory in respect of which a mandate on behalf of the League of Nations has been accepted by His Britannic Majesty, other than those mandated territories mentioned in Articles 14 and 16, the stipulations of Articles 14 and 15 shall be deemed to apply to such Protectorates or States or mandated territories from the date and in the manner prescribed in the notes to be exchanged for the purpose of effecting such extension.

ARTICLE 18

The present Treaty shall come into force ten days after its publication, in conformity with the forms prescribed by the laws of the High Contracting Parties. It may be terminated by either of the High Contracting Parties by a notice not exceeding one year and not less than six months.

In the absence of an express provision to that effect, a notice given under the first paragraph of this Article shall not affect the operation of the Treaty as between the United States of America and any territory in respect of which notice of accession has been given under Article 14.

The present Treaty shall be ratified, and the ratifications shall be exchanged at London as soon as possible.

On the coming into force of the present treaty the provisions of Article 10 of the treaty of the 9th August, 1842, of the Convention of the 12th July, 1889, of the supplementary Convention of the 13th December, 1900, and of the supplementary Convention of the 12th April, 1905, relative to extradition, shall cease to have effect, save that in the case of each of the Dominions and India, mentioned in Article 14, those provisions shall remain in force until such Dominion or India shall have acceded to the present treaty in accordance with Article 14 or until replaced by other treaty arrangements.

In faith whereof the above-named plenipotentiaries have signed the present Treaty and have affixed thereto their seals.

Done in duplicate at London this twenty-second day of December, 1931.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

FRIDAY, FEBRUARY 19, 1932

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Thou hast said, Heavenly Father, not a sparrow falls to the ground unnoticed. We thank Thee that not a trouble enters any breast that the eye of the Lord dost not behold. We praise Thee that it is the nature of greatness not to despise littleness; that it is the nature of strength to be drawn toward weakness and that purity never seems so sublime as when it stoops to impurity. So we come, Blessed Lord, with our conscious smallness and insufficiency, and we are comforted in the truth that we are guarded and sheltered in the folds of divine care. O Thou who art the Master of the morning and evening, may we never live for the pride of the eye, for the lusts of the flesh, nor for the pomp and vanity of this age-old world. Help us to cling to that which is beyond their touch and find treasures that moth can not corrupt. Through calm and storm pour upon our pathway the balm of Thy holy presence as on we go. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

THE TRAFFIC SITUATION IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a report given to me by the director of traffic of the District of Columbia.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Connecticut?

There was no objection.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following report furnished to me by the director of traffic of the District of Columbia:

GOVERNMENT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
DEPARTMENT OF VEHICLES AND TRAFFIC,
February 16, 1932.

Hon. AUGUSTINE LONERGAN,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN LONERGAN: Some time ago you requested this office to supply you with a schedule of proposed traffic lights.

We have not yet completed our survey of the District, but we have picked out some of the most important places where traffic lights are obviously desired. Traffic counts have been made at these intersections. The results are shown on the tabulation attached hereto.

This list does not, by any means, include the total list of all of the intersections in Washington where traffic lights are justified. We are now making an official traffic survey and we hope within the next few months to complete studies at all of the most important intersections in the District. After this is done we shall be glad to supply you with a digest of these studies.

You also requested the number of police in the different cities the size of Washington. There is attached hereto a report issued by the Bureau of Investigation, United States Department of Justice, including a list of large cities and giving the number of police employees per thousand population.

You also asked us to supply you with the number of traffic lights in the various cities the size of Washington. Attached hereto is a list of traffic lights in four cities—Chicago, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington. These are all of the cities we have information on at this time.

If I can supply you with any additional information please let me know.

Very truly yours,
W. A. VAN DUZER,
Director of Vehicles and Traffic.

DEPARTMENTS OF STATE, JUSTICE, COMMERCE, AND LABOR APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9349) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the State and Justice Departments, judiciary, and Commerce and Labor Departments appropriation bill, with Mr. MCREYNOLDS in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 30 minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, ever since I came to Congress in April, 1917, I have been making an earnest, consistent fight for economy and for the abolishment of useless and unnecessary bureaus and expensive commissions which in recent years have been formed and created so frequently. In my judgment half of the bureaus here could be abolished.

I have served here during the times when many distinguished men of the Nation have been chairmen of the Committee on Appropriations: Hon. John J. Fitzgerald, of New York; Hon. Swagar Shirley, of Kentucky; Hon. James W. Good, of Iowa; Hon. Martin B. Madden, of Illinois, than whom I have always thought there has never been a more valuable man to the country; Hon. Dan Anthony, of Kansas, whom we all loved; and our good friend, Hon. WILL WOOD, of Indiana, whom we all greatly respect and who for years made an earnest fight here for economy.

I have duly appreciated the efforts of all of them; but, in my judgment, the peer of the entire group of distinguished economists and splendid representatives of the people is the now chairman of our Committee on Appropriations, Hon. JOSEPH W. BYRNS, of Tennessee. [Applause.] The gentleman from Tennessee has a wonderful knowledge of and insight into governmental affairs and budgetary expenses, and he is doing most valuable work.

I have served here for 15 years with our friend, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER]. I have worked with him, followed him, and fought side by side with him here on the floor on many occasions, but I have never really known him until the last two months, because I did not have the opportunity of seeing him in real action. I wish every citizen of the United States could know just what the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHREVE] and I know, for instance, about the qualifications of the gentleman from Alabama, and his earnest, patient, and hard-working efforts to save the people of this country useless expense, and to help balance a budget that an unusually depleted treasury calls for.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield for a suggestion?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. COLE of Iowa. As a Member on this side of the aisle I want to indorse every statement that the gentleman from Texas has made about the gentleman from Alabama. I have been watching him for 10 or 12 years. I have unbounded admiration for him and faith in his transaction of business.

Mr. BLANTON. I am sure we all appreciate the distinguished gentleman from Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I see that I am going to need additional time, and my friend, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, has promised to yield me 10 additional minutes. I wonder if he would grant me that time now?

Mr. SHREVE. I am very happy, indeed, to yield to my friend, the gentleman from Texas, 10 additional minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas is recognized for 40 instead of 30 minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] knows more about the intimate business details of every bureau that appears before him than the bureau chief himself knows about it. That is the reason he is able to hold them in line, and that is the reason that when they come and ask for something they are not entitled to, he turns them down, and is able to give them a good reason for it. I want to commend our distinguished friend, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHREVE], for the able assistance he has at all times given Chairman OLIVER on that committee. He, too, knows about this business, and it has been the greatest honor and privilege and pleasure that I have ever had in my life to have been able to work with and serve under those two distinguished gentlemen. [Applause.]

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. HOWARD. It seems to me the country ought to know that which the gentleman from Texas is speaking about now. It ought to be very valuable to the country to know that type of our fellows who are trying to perform this wonderful service in behalf of the people, and I think more people really ought to hear this address by the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. I will say to my good friend from Nebraska [Mr. HOWARD] that the people both in Alabama and Pennsylvania will know about what I am now saying, even if they can not hear me. My remarks are going into this RECORD. This RECORD goes daily into every village in the United States, and people read the RECORD. Fun is made of it, but it is one of the most valuable publications now that goes to the people of the United States, because they get the exact proceedings that happen here on the floor of the House, unwarped by friendly or unfriendly newspapers. Sixty copies of the daily CONGRESSIONAL RECORD go into every one of the 435 districts of the United States every day. And it is a great protection to the Members who serve here in this House.

Mr. HOWARD. I am glad to hear the gentleman make that statement, and now I am moved to ask the gentleman if he will not use his best influence to help me pass a resolution which I have been introducing for the past 10 years, to require the Government to send a daily copy of the RECORD to every public and parochial high school in America.

Mr. BLANTON. I will vote for the gentleman's bill if he will get it before the House. It would be of great benefit to the classes on government in every high school in the land.

Mr. HOWARD. Well, if the gentleman would help me get it out of committee.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Mr. Chairman, I object to lobbying on the floor of the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. I thank the gentleman. The kind of lobbying our good friend from Nebraska will ever do here will never do any harm to the people in the United States.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I will gladly yield to my friend in a few minutes. I want to tell you something more about the distinguished gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER].

Mr. UNDERHILL. We all know that.

Mr. BLANTON. There has been such a turnover in membership here that many of our new colleagues may not be personally acquainted with the gentleman from Alabama and his splendid work on committees. He is one of the most patient men I have ever known. He is one of the most courteous gentlemen I have ever met. While careful at all times to observe the rights and privileges of others, and to accord to them their full deserts, he is firm in all decisions and as brave as a lion. He is as dependable as the Rock of Gibraltar. The gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN], the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHREVE], the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON], the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM], and myself have, with Chairman OLIVER, been the subcommittee that has held the hearings and framed the appropriation bills for the Department of Justice, the Department of State, the Department of Commerce, and the Department of Labor.

The country has the benefit of having, as chairman of the subcommittee handling this present bill, one of the most important supply bills of the Congress, one of the ablest and most distinguished lawyers of the United States, Mr. OLIVER. He is a graduate of the University of Alabama. He has a degree from the college of arts and sciences there. He has also his law degree from it. He has the honorary degree of doctor of laws from his own university and from a law university here in Washington. He has been a distinguished prosecutor in his State, a solicitor general. I want to say this to you, which you might not know: In all the cases he has tried as prosecutor for the people, counting those which have been nolle prossed, he has a record of 97 per cent of convictions. Is not that a wonderful record? [Applause.]

It might be interesting to know that at college he received the Phi Beta Kappa key, something which not all of us get. He was dean of the law school of the University of Alabama when he was elected to Congress. He was that kind of a man, and you have that kind of a man to hold most important hearings and help frame your supply bills. He has, with one exception, been supported 100 per cent, and had the help of his committee all the way down the line—and you are going to be interested in the speech he makes about this most important supply bill.

I could not begin the speech I am now going to make without some reference to the splendid work of the committee clerk who has helped us in the handling of this big appropriation bill, Bob Nagle, of Kansas. He came here with Dan Anthony, and that ought to be recommendation enough for him. If Dan Anthony would bring him here, he is all right. He has been of great help to the committee. He is a man of unusual ability, and it has been a pleasure to work with him.

Now, I want to answer yesterday's speech of my colleague on this committee, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM]. The spirit of fair play is the only thing that actuates me. From my boyhood days I have stood for fair play. I believe in fair play for everybody. I have never liked to see anyone take an unfair advantage of another. My subject is Fair Play.

Let me tell you that this is not a mere fight between our friend Mr. TINKHAM and Bishop Cannon. He is leveling his fight against the whole dry cause of this Nation; against every good woman who believes in prohibition and every good man who believes in it. He singles out Bishop Cannon at whom to shoot his big guns, but I can not let him get away with it, as a friend of the cause which I have been following for some years myself.

I asked the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] some questions yesterday when he was making his speech; these, with his answers, I now quote from the RECORD:

Mr. BLANTON. Then there was no such claim made by the gentleman's attorney, that the gentleman, being a Congressman, had no right to waive immunity?

Mr. TINKHAM. Not that I know of. I was not present.

Mr. BLANTON. The press also reports that the gentleman's attorneys claimed that Bishop Cannon having dared the gentleman from Massachusetts to make the statement and to waive immunity, that the gentleman's accepting the dare did not take away from him the constitutional immunity that surrounds a Congressman and protects him.

Mr. TINKHAM. I think that is not good law, nor do I know that my attorney made any such claim. In any event, no such claim will be made by my attorney or by me, and no claim of constitutional immunity was made by me.

And when I pressed the gentleman from Massachusetts further for a definite answer he stated:

No demand was made, so far as I am concerned, for any immunity or congressional privilege, nor will my attorney make such claim, nor do I nor will I.

Mr. BLANTON. Then the gentleman has not won out on this damage suit, as the press reports?

Mr. TINKHAM. That was not correct either.

Mr. BLANTON. There has been no court ruling on the question at all in the gentleman's favor?

Mr. TINKHAM. Well, I think there has been some ruling.

Mr. BLANTON. What ruling was that? We would like to know about it.

Mr. TINKHAM. Well, I do not have the pleadings before me.

Mr. BLANTON. But what kind of a law question did the gentleman's lawyer raise that the court sustained him on?

Mr. TINKHAM. Bishop Cannon's attorney made a plea to strike out two or three parts of the answer.

Mr. BLANTON. As being scandalous?

Mr. TINKHAM. Not as being scandalous, but as not being in conformity with the practice in this district.

And I quote from the RECORD my further colloquy:

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman will understand I hold no brief for Bishop Cannon.

Mr. TINKHAM. I understand that.

Mr. BLANTON. I am just interested in knowing what the real facts are that keep the gentleman and Bishop Cannon from going to bat. I want to go down there and hear his lawyer cross-examine the gentleman, and I want to hear the gentleman cross-examine Bishop Cannon.

Mr. TINKHAM. I think I have made a clear statement that I desire to have a trial as soon as possible and that I have waived all congressional immunity in relation to the trial.

Having read recently in the daily press a very contrary statement of facts, and being interested to know just what the court situation was, I procured this morning from the official legal documents that are filed in the District Supreme Court the real facts, and in the interest of fair play I want to read you some excerpts from the pleadings in this case.

Here is the declaration of Bishop Cannon, filed in cause at Law No. 79715 in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, where he sues our friend from Massachusetts for libel. Here is the plea of our friend from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM], filed December 29, 1931. You will note it is not signed by any lawyer for him—it is signed by himself, and in his own behalf—so, of course, he has knowledge of it. It is signed "GEORGE HOLDEN TINKHAM, pro se," so he must have knowledge of its contents. Listen to what he says:

Now comes the defendant, and for pleas in the above cause says:
(1) That he is a Member of Congress of the United States from the State of Massachusetts and that he has been a Member of Congress since March 4, 1915.

And then, after referring to his statement, he pleads in subdivision (3):

It was a privileged statement. He says over his own signature that such statement was a privileged statement, and it is signed GEORGE HOLDEN TINKHAM.

Well, now, he ought to think back and remember the kind of special pleas he files before he comes on the floor of the House and makes this attack. This plea was filed by him on December 29, 1931.

I hold no brief for Bishop Cannon. You know, I did not like it much when Bishop Cannon deserted the Democratic party and helped to elect Hoover. Bishop Cannon was born in Maryland but, ever since he was a boy, has been a Virginian. My father was born in Cumberland County, Va., and I have always taken some pride in the fact that my father was a Virginian. Bishop Cannon, raised in Virginia, having spent all of his life there since he was a boy, was a Democrat, and he had voted the Democratic ticket ever since he reached his majority.

But because he did not like somebody on the 1928 Democratic ticket, he got out and made a fight for a Republican. And he made a winning fight. I did not like that much. He helped to carry some old, rock-ribbed Democratic States for a Republican. But he had plenty of help. He was assisted by Methodists, Baptists, Presbyterians, Christians, Episcopalians, and Catholics. I know a number of prominent Catholics who voted against the wet candidate. And he thus helped to carry old, rock-ribbed Democratic States for a Republican who, in my judgment, is just as wet as the other candidate was, not by declaration but in fact, because, as Chief Executive of the Nation, with the burden upon his shoulders of enforcing the law, he permits such a wet Washington to exist that even men like our friends LAGUARDIA, BECK, LINTHICUM, O'CONNOR, and all these others are broadcasting the Crusaders map of Washington with so many speak-easy points marked on it that you can hardly recognize the map for the number of speak-easies appearing on it.

Mr. UNDERHILL. The gentleman, of course, wants to be fair.

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. UNDERHILL. And he does not hold the President of the United States responsible for the alleged number of speak-easies there are in Washington?

Mr. BLANTON. He could close them up before midnight if he wanted to.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Oh, he could not.

Mr. BLANTON. If he were an Andrew Jackson, he would do it. Andrew Jackson would close them up and keep them closed. He would close them up here in Washington before night. President Hoover, if he were a dry, would close them up; and that is the reason I am making my statement that he is a wet.

Now, I did not like it at all when Bishop Cannon helped to carry my district Republican by 11,000 when it was Democratic overwhelmingly. It was something unheard of. It kind of went against my grain.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Where were you?

Mr. BLANTON. I was fighting for my party.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Why did you not stop it?

Mr. BLANTON. There were too many good women and preachers campaigning. It went against the wet issue, because my district is Democratic.

Now, I want to say this. The Anti-Saloon League has never spent one 5-cent piece in my district for me. It has never donated a nickel in any campaign for me in my life. It has never indorsed me in a single campaign that I have ever made. It does not indorse candidates down in my State. I have served the cause loyally, and I have helped to dry up as many counties in Texas from the saloon traffic as any man in Texas, and yet it has never indorsed me. If a man were to run against me in this campaign and he claimed to be a dry, the Anti-Saloon League would not say one word in my favor. It would let us run out our own campaign. So my speech will not help me politically. I hold no brief for the Anti-Saloon League. I am a friend to it and I have been contributing to the cause it advocates ever since I was a young man, because I have always believed in it. But it is not the only dry organization. There are numerous ones, and the Anti-Saloon League could go out of existence to-morrow and yet the dry cause would be upheld and carried on in the United States just the same.

But, getting back to this other matter, my subject of "fair play," here is what Bishop Cannon did when the gentleman from Massachusetts filed that plea of privilege. He made the following motion to strike it out:

> Now comes the plaintiff and moves to strike the following from the defendant's plea, that part of defendant's plea that reads that it was a privileged statement.

Bishop Cannon further pleaded:

> That the plea of privilege is not available to the defendant inasmuch as the alleged libelous statement contains a waiver of defendant's privilege as a Member of Congress.

And in support of that motion, Bishop Cannon submitted this to the court:

> While any statement made on the floor of the Houses of Congress is absolutely privileged under Cochrane v. Couzens (59 Appeals D. C. 374), it does not follow that a Member of Congress may not repeat that statement on the outside of the halls of Congress and be held in damages for libel if the article is proven to be libelous.

Thus Bishop Cannon asked that the plea of privilege be stricken from the answer of our friend from Massachusetts.

In opposition to Bishop Cannon's motion to strike out his plea of privilege, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] then filed the following plea on January 25, 1932, from which I quote:

> The court will observe that the plea herein by defendant was filed by him in his proper person and without the aid of local counsel.

Then the defendant, Mr. TINKHAM, the gentleman from Massachusetts, through his lawyer, on January 25, 1932, further pleaded:

> The privilege of congressional immunity has not been conferred upon Members of Congress for their individual benefit, but as a matter of public concern, and so that representatives of the people shall not be in fear of being subjected to personal liability or otherwise hampered in the performance of their national duties. As this privilege was in no sense conferred or created for the benefit of the individual, but for the public and national benefit, it can not be waived by the individual.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] sets up in court that he has no authority to waive any immunity, just exactly the point I raised here yesterday afternoon in questioning him, because you will remember I asked Mr. TINKHAM this question:

> Mr. BLANTON. The press also reports that the gentleman's attorneys claimed that Bishop Cannon having dared the gentleman from Massachusetts to make the statement and to waive immunity, that the gentleman's accepting the dare did not take away from him the constitutional immunity that surrounds a Congressman and protects him.
>
> Mr. TINKHAM. I think that is not good law, nor do I know that my attorney made any such claim. In any event, no such claim will be made by my attorney or by me, and no claim of constitutional immunity was made by me. * * *
>
> * * * No demand was made, so far as I am concerned, for any immunity or congressional privilege, nor will my attorney make such claim, nor do I, nor will I.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Does not the gentleman think that both sides were guilty of stooping to technicalities when the people of the United States are entitled to have the full facts?

Mr. BLANTON. I will show the gentleman later that they are going to get them, because there will be a trial on its merits. Here is what the court held on that plea of privilege. Here is the order of the court filed February 2, 1932:

> The motion of the plaintiff is granted [that is, of Bishop Cannon] as to that part of the defendant's plea reading, "And that is a privileged statement."

The court thus held that that plea of Mr. TINKHAM's that it was privileged should be stricken from his answer, and the court ordered that to be done on February 2, 1932, and granted the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] 10 days in which to replead.

And the judge who thus ordered that the plea of privilege of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] be stricken from his answer, is Justice Gordon, a life-long pronounced "wet" who would under no circumstances show any favoritism to Bishop Cannon.

It was this unfairness on the part of our friend from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM], who yesterday from this floor, where with the immunity which protects all Congressmen and without his legal opponent being present or having any knowledge of his speech, accused Bishop Cannon of hiding behind the skirts of a woman, when he himself had claimed in court a privilege which he had waived, that caused me to get the records on the matter.

And then, after the court struck out his plea of privilege, the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] on February 10, 1932, came into court with this plea that even though it was not privileged, that he, having been dared to do it, he had the right to do it.

I asked him yesterday about that, and he said he did not know anything about it.

And yet here is his plea he filed on February 10 in his answer:

Leave of court first having been obtained, the defendant, GEORGE H. TINKHAM, by his counsel, files herein his additional plea to the declaration and says the alleged libelous article was so published by the defendant at the instance and the request of the plaintiff, and in response to his public invitation that the defendant make publication thereof by giving the same to the public press, and defendant says that such publication was so invited and requested by plaintiff—

And so forth.

And for a second additional plea, the defendant, GEORGE H. TINKHAM, by leave of court, further says that he is and at the time of the alleged libelous publication in the declaration was a Member of Congress of the United States and, in his official character as such Member of Congress, he made an investigation into the conduct of the plaintiff during the political campaign for the election of the President and Vice President of the United States and Members of the Congress of the United States; that, by reason of the investigation so made by the defendant as a Member of Congress as aforesaid, he—

And so forth.

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Will the gentleman yield? I would like to know upon what basis or what assurance the gentleman has that Bishop Cannon will give us all the facts regarding the solicitation and distribution of the funds and where they originated.

Mr. BLANTON. I am coming to that. When our friend from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] set up that new plea that it was privileged because he had been dared to do it, Bishop Cannon's lawyer came into court and filed this "joinder of issue." The great Solicitor General from Pennsylvania [Mr. BECK] knows what that means. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLARKE of New York. Does the gentleman mean to say that the rest of us do not?

Mr. BLANTON. Well, I picked the gentleman from Pennsylvania out because he is the brains of the wet cause. [Laughter.] On February 17, 1932, Bishop Cannon's lawyer came into court and filed this "joinder of issue."

The plaintiff joins issue on the pleas of the defendant filed herein.

That brings the case up where it is to be set for trial and tried on its merits. [Applause.]

They will have Bishop Cannon there with his attorney, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] can question him if he wants to. They will have Mr. GEORGE HOLDEN TINKHAM there, and the bishop's lawyers will question him. But if I were an attorney for Bishop Cannon, I would never let the libel case be tried until the criminal case is disposed of finally.

Now, I am surprised that so good a lawyer as my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] should come here and make the speech he made yesterday, and deny that he tried to hide behind his immunity. It is proof that he does have malice against the bishop, for in his main speech yesterday he said:

I have not pleaded and will not claim any constitutional or congressional immunity.

Now, I hold no brief for Bishop Cannon. He and his attorneys can properly defend him in court. But he ought to be proud of the fact that the gentleman from Massachusetts is after him. The gentleman from Massachusetts is a big-game hunter. [Laughter.] He does not hunt little game. The game that he hunts is no smaller than elephants. [Laughter.] I have seen a kodak of him and one of his dead elephants. He is sure that when his gun goes off it hits something, because the game he aims toward is always big. I would be proud if he were shooting at me, because I would know that he thought I was big enough to shoot at. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOYLAN. The gentleman says that the gentleman from Massachusetts is a big-game hunter; is he a big-doe hunter?

Mr. BLANTON. I do not know. The libel case, I imagine, involves some dough. But let me get back to my subject, Fair Play. The distinguished gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] in his speech yesterday called attention to the fact that Bishop Cannon had been indicted by a Federal grand jury here in Washington last October, and said:

Bishop Cannon, according to the press, apparently will escape confinement at the Federal penitentiary at Atlanta by employing the same methods invoked by notorious gunmen and professional criminals, namely, by making a technical objection to the criminal indictment. The sum total of his objection to the indictment, which was sustained by the court, was that it did not allege as a fact that Miss Burroughs, treasurer of the political committee of which Bishop Cannon was chairman, a former secretary and employee of the bishop, knew that Bishop Cannon had received from E. C. Jameson the funds which were not reported under the Federal corrupt practices act. It is unusual even for gunmen and professional criminals to seek shelter behind a woman.

Bishop Cannon has repeatedly stated that he desired a judicial, not a political, determination of this issue; yet when a judicial determination could have been obtained, he made it impossible by evasion and technical objection.

Is this statement of our friend from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] altogether fair? Is it giving Bishop Cannon fair play? Was it Bishop Cannon who was "making a trial impossible by evasion and technical objection? Was Bishop Cannon pleading immunity? Was Bishop Cannon pleading privilege? Was Bishop Cannon seeking shelter behind a woman? Who was seeking shelter behind 'immunity'? Who was seeking shelter behind 'privilege'?"

Should not our friend from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM], to be fair, have told whether or not he influenced the indictment to be found against the bishop? Should he not tell us just what efforts he made to get the indictment, if he made any? Should he not have told the readers of the RECORD that as an influential member of the great Committee on Appropriations he has great power with all departments in the District of Columbia, and that he is a member of the subcommittee of six that makes appropriations for all judges and district attorneys in Washington, and that he interrogates all officials of the Department of Justice, including the Attorney General of the United States, when they come before him while hearings are going on. Here is what he did say:

In November of 1929 I called to the attention of the so-called lobby-investigating committee of the Senate headed by the late Senator Caraway the violation of the traditional American principle of the separation of church and state by certain ecclesiastical organizations through political dictation to the executive, legislative, and judicial branches of the Government. Accepting an invitation to appear before the committee, I made charges against the Board of Temperance, Prohibition, and Public Morals of the Methodist Episcopal Church, the Federal Council of the Churches of Christ in America, and the Commission on Prohibition and Social Service of the Methodist Episcopal Church South, of which Bishop Cannon was and is chairman.

Now, if the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] would go to all of that trouble before the Senate committee, I wonder just how much trouble he went to in influencing the indictment. But he should have been fair enough to give all of the facts about the indictment and told you that the court held that it did not state an offense. I copy the following from the court's opinion, rendered on February 12, 1932, by Justice James M. Proctor, of the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia, to wit:

Several counts of the indictment accuse the defendants, Ada L. Burroughs, treasurer of a political committee to influence election of presidential and vice presidential electors, and James Cannon, jr., as her accomplice, with violating the corrupt practices act by failing to file statements of certain contributions made for the committee. Other counts accuse the defendants with conspiracy to commit the offenses described in the counts mentioned above.

Every count is grounded upon an alleged failure to report contributions made by one Jameson for the committee, rather than directly to it. There is no allegation as to whom any contribution was actually delivered by Jameson or that the recipient made any report or accounting to Burroughs, the treasurer, nor is it shown that she had knowledge thereof.

The defendants, by demurrer, challenge the constitutionality of those provisions of the corrupt practices act which relate to presidential and vice presidential electors, also the sufficiency of the indictment as a pleading. Among the latter objections it is contended that no offense has been stated because of the failure to allege as a fact that the Jameson contributions were reported and accounted for to Burroughs, treasurer, or that she had knowledge thereof.

It is insisted that such an allegation is necessary because the true meaning and intention of section 244 of the act requires the treasurer of a political committee to report only such contributions as are received directly by him and those received by others which have been duly reported and accounted for to him; and further at all events the indictment should show that the treasurer had knowledge of indirect contributions before being chargeable with a failure to include them in the statements which he must file under the law.

In my opinion these objections are well taken. A consideration of section 244 in the light of all other related provisions of the act leads fairly to the conclusion that the legislative intention is to require the treasurer of a political committee to report only contributions received by him and those duly reported to or accounted for to him. Certainly it was not intended to hold one criminally responsible for failure to report a contribution of which he had no knowledge.

This is a proposition advanced by the Government to which I can not consent. It calls for an unreasonable and harsh construction which is neither warranted by the nature of the act, its language, nor its intent. Given such a meaning, a treasurer who has filed a statement honestly and correctly, revealing every contribution known to him, would nevertheless be liable to prosecution because of an inevitable omission of a contribution made for the committee to another of which he had no knowledge. No such unjust purpose can be attributed to this legislation.

Nor am I to accept the alternative contention that those counts which charge a willful failure by Burroughs to report contributions made for the committee impute to her knowledge of contributions received by another. The term 'willful' as used in these counts is merely an adoption of the word employed in section 252 to differentiate in the penalties between a purposed and intentional violation of the act and one occurring thoughtlessly or accidentally through inadvertence or mistake. The reasoning and authorities in support of these theories are, I think, based upon fundamental misconceptions.

In my judgment, for the reasons mentioned, all counts in the indictment as drawn fail to allege facts essential to constitute any criminal offense. The demurrer must, therefore, be sustained as to each count. An order will be entered accordingly.

Now, I am wondering, Mr. Chairman, just what power and influence has caused the district attorney to take an appeal from the above very clear decision of the court in favor of Bishop Cannon. The court held clearly that the indictment did not charge an offense. The court quashed the indictment. This ought to settle the case. But the district attorney stated that he would appeal from such decision. Why? Who wants him to appeal? Is there any other person in the United States except our friend from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] who wants to further prosecute the matter?

Just why did the gentleman make his speech yesterday? Why did he wind it up—that is, his specially prepared part before I began to question him—with the following assault—may I say vicious assault—upon Bishop Cannon, to wit:

In order completely to expose this spurious, self-designated moral leader and ecclesiastical whitened sepulcher, I challenge him to try his libel suit against me, and I hereby call upon him through his counsel to arrange with the counsel representing me for an early trial at this term of court before it adjourns at the end of June, that truth under oath shall be developed not only for the benefit of the jury sitting to try this case but for the information and enlightenment of that larger jury, the American people.

Is there any malice in that statement? It appears to me to be teeming with malice. If you were Bishop Cannon would you try your civil case until the district attorney had finished his appeal from the judgment of the court quashing said criminal indictment? If you were Bishop Cannon's lawyer, would you not wait until this district attorney had his appeal settled? But let me quote the last page of the gentleman's special new plea in this libel suit, which is as follows:

Said statements theretofore reported by the public press as made by defendant on the floor of the House of Representatives; and plaintiff further stated, in substance and effect, in the publication so made and caused to be made by him as aforesaid, that defendant was immune from prosecution for false, libelous statements so made by him upon the floor of the House of Representatives, and that unless and until the defendant should comply with the challenge and request of the plaintiff to publish the statements aforesaid in the public press and over the signature of this defendant and unless defendant waived his congressional immunity with reference to such statements, defendant could not command the respect of honorable men and that failure on the part of defendant to make such publication would brand him as a coward. And defendant, because of the said challenge and invitation of the plaintiff aforesaid and of the statements made therein concerning the conduct and character of the defendant, and in order to defend his character and conduct in the premises from the attack made thereon by the plaintiff, as hereinbefore set forth, and for the purpose of refuting the charge that defendant was a coward as charged by plaintiff, and without malice toward the plaintiff, caused to be published the alleged libelous article in the declaration set forth, as he might lawfully do, the premises considered.

WHITEFORD, MARSHALL & HART,
Attorneys for Defendant.
By ROBERT J. WHITEFORD.

Now, being interested in "fair play," I got the original manuscript of his speech that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] sent to the Printing Office last night and examined it. I found that it was a mimeographed or manifold copy, and at the top of it were these words, "For release upon delivery," showing that he had had made a lot of copies for the press. It showed that he was giving it out to the press, and they could not use it until he "delivered it." I happen to know that he arranged to make that speech yesterday at 1.30 o'clock.

Mr. RANKIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. RANKIN. Suppose the press had given it out and he had failed to get recognition, then would he have been entitled to congressional immunity?

Mr. BLANTON. He would have been in a terrible fix.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. I understand that the plaintiff in the case is in the courtroom, so to speak. Does the gentleman not think it would be proper that the defendant should be here?

Mr. BLANTON. I am not responsible. I imagine that if somebody were up here on this floor condemning me I would be around here somewhere looking after my interests. I imagine that my friend would also. If my integrity were being attacked somewhere, I would be there to see about it; and I admire a man who will look after his side of a controversy. [Applause.]

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I am not going to be distracted from my subject of "fair play" by my wet friends. But I will yield to them later.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Let me ask the gentleman——

Mr. BLANTON. I do not want to yield yet; I will in a moment. Then I shall yield to every wet on the floor, and I think that at least two-thirds of all of the wets in the House are here now. [Laughter.]

As I started to say when I was interrupted, I happen to know that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] made arrangements yesterday to be recognized and to use his time at 1.30 p. m. He was told by me that I would answer him, as I had understood that he would then make his prepared attack on the prohibition enforcement unit in the Department of Justice. For if you will examine the hearings, you will see that for about three and one-half days he kept the Attorney General of the United States, General Mitchell, and Colonel Woodcock on the witness stand cross-examining them, and that he thus consumed the hearings from pages 143 to 259.

But the gentleman put off his speech from time to time, and finally advised that he would not take the floor until after 4 o'clock, and this meant that there could be no answer before to-day. And it was about 4.20 p. m. when he took the floor.

I believe also that he waited so that he could get a better "covering" from the newspapers, as it was too late for the afternoon papers and he thought the morning papers would give much of the text of his speech.

Do you know that the gentleman even wrote the heading for his speech in large capitals? The manuscript shows this. And, being a mimeograph copy, it shows that the heading was on all of the copies he had handed out to the press. He was not willing to have the newspaper boys put their own interpretation to it and put their own headlines on it. He had to write the headlines for it himself. His heading is:

Congressman TINKHAM renews his charges against Bishop Cannon, jr., and challenges Bishop Cannon to try his libel suit against him.

And I notice that some of the newspapers to-day followed that word for word. But that is not all.

Mr. MARTIN of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. In just a moment. That is not all. The last closing words he uttered here yesterday afternoon in his speech were these, because I have the record of his speech. These are what the reporter took down:

Permit me to say that we can not always believe everything we see in the newspapers.

But he sent it to the Printing Office last night; he struck that out; he did not print that, because he knew that after he had given this speech out to the press, if that sentence went down at the bottom it would make all of the press boys mad, and they would not print it, so he struck that out.

I want the people of the United States to get these facts that I put in from the court records, and compare them with Mr. TINKHAM'S speech, and I think they must conclude that Mr. TINKHAM as a Congressman is not giving this bishop a square, fair fight for his money in the court. Why does he not wait until this case is tried; why does he want to fight it out here, where every word he utters is immune?

The bishop can not speak here. The bishop is not immune. Why does he not give the bishop a fair chance? Why do not you Republicans see that he does that? A Republican President is in the White House because of what this bishop and other preachers did for him. Did you know that it was this bishop's efforts that helped to defeat your great Senator Wadsworth from New York because he was a wet? That is the kind of influence that he exerted. I am advised that William Randolph Hearst's office wired the examiner's office in San Francisco and said, in effect, "Bishop Cannon is becoming too powerful. You want to find out something on his children." Is that fair?

My God! How could they attack a man's children when they want to ruin him? Is that fair? I appeal to every honest man on this floor—and my service with you makes me believe that you are for a fair, square deal—I appeal to you to wait until this case is decided in the court before we hear any further from Mr. TINKHAM on the question. Then we will know both sides.

Mr. BOYLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield to both of my wet friends who have risen. I yield to the gentleman from New York first.

Mr. BOYLAN. The gentleman made a very interesting statement, saying that his client, whom he is so ably representing this morning——

Mr. BLANTON. No. The gentleman is wrong. I did not say "client." I have never seen Bishop Cannon but twice in my whole life. He did not know yesterday that I would ask questions of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BOYLAN. Well, the gentleman's friend, then——

Mr. BLANTON. I can not say that. He may not be my friend, but I say he is fighting for a cause to which I am friendly; a cause that my mother fought for; a cause that the gentleman's mother probably fought for, and I uphold on the floor of this House of Representatives that cause because I am under oath to uphold it. [Applause.]

Mr. BOYLAN. Exactly. Now, I want to ask the gentleman about a very interesting statement he made. The statement was that the present estimable gentleman who occupies the White House was put there, in part, by the worthy bishop.

Mr. BLANTON. I think he helped do it; he and a hundred thousand other good ministers of the gospel.

Mr. BOYLAN. In that connection, I would like to ask the gentleman whether or not the bishop carried the gentleman's district for the gentleman in the White House?

Mr. BLANTON. He helped do it.

Mr. BOYLAN. And he carried it?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; he and other preachers helped do it, and they helped to keep me out of the United States Senate, because I came out for Governor Smith after he was naminated in the national convention at Houston, where I was born.

Mr. BOYLAN. And the gentleman is a friend of his and he kept the gentleman out of the United States Senate? I am appalled. I am astonished.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, I am a friend to the dry cause. Bishop Cannon is a mere incident to it, but I want a fair deal for him. I believe in fair play. I have been for the underdog all of my life. [Applause.] I do not want somebody to take advantage of somebody else. If Bishop Cannon is guilty of wrongdoing, I am not for him. But if he is innocent, I am for him. And in any event, he is entitled to a fair, square deal, and a fair, square trial.

Mr. BOYLAN. But I do not think the gentleman ought to be for a man who kept him out of the United States Senate. I would not be for him. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. I believe in giving a fair deal to everyone.

Mr. IGOE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I now yield to my friend the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. IGOE. The gentleman said he wanted a fair, square deal for Bishop Cannon.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes. I ask the gentleman if he is for Bishop Cannon or for Mr. TINKHAM getting fair treatment? I am for both getting a fair deal.

Mr. IGOE. Now, if the gentleman will wait a minute. The gentleman asked for a fair, square deal for the bishop.

Mr. BLANTON. Yes.

Mr. IGOE. Will the bishop give the wet cause a fair, square deal before the country?

Mr. BLANTON. If he is going to give the wet cause what I am going to give it, he is going to give it hell. [Laughter and applause.] That is what I will give the liquor traffic as long as I am able to make public speeches.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. That is what the liquor traffic deserves, I will say to my good friend the gentleman from Wisconsin, to whom I now yield.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER. Is the gentleman from Texas giving the wet cause hell by placing in nomination for the Presidency the gentleman from his State who voted against submitting the eighteenth amendment to the various States?

Mr. BLANTON. Is the gentleman from Wisconsin wet or dry? Let me pause and ask again, Is the gentleman from Wisconsin wet or dry? If he is wet——

Mr. SCHAFER. I am opposed to the eighteenth amendment and the sumptuary prohibition laws enacted thereunder, which have changed the American Constitution from a charter of rights and liberties into a criminal statute book.

Mr. BLANTON. Now, I do not yield further. I am going to answer the gentleman's question. The gentleman from Wisconsin has been posing here as a wet ever since he came to Congress. He has been trying to be a wet leader.

He has been frothing beer at the mouth ever since he has been on this floor, and yet he tries to undertake to say that he would object to my nominating a man who had voted against the eighteenth amendment. If I had nominated such a man, the gentleman from Wisconsin ought to be supporting him. If he is a real wet, he ought to do it.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. No; I regret that I can not yield further. I am going to answer the gentleman. The man I nominated for President knows more about Government business than any other man in the United States, without any exception. [Applause.] He has been for the common people all of his life. He has been fighting the battles of the common people ever since he was born. He is one of the common people himself. He knows what their problems are. He knows the kind of obstacles that stand in the way of making a proper living in life according to American standards of living. He has been for them during his nearly 30 years of able service here.

Prohibition has been a mere incident in his life. A great statesman of his magnitude always concerns himself about more than one question. He has concerned himself about every issue that in any way affects the lives of families all over the country. And he has sound judgment. The gentleman from Wisconsin has no right to say that he is a "wet." And I have no right to say that he is a "dry." But, whatever he is, he suits me, and I believe that he suits the people of the United States.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield five additional minutes to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. The distinguished statesman I nominated has been for the big things that help the American people, and he has got the confidence of every single person who wants economical government for the people in the United States. Just see how they came out for him this morning as reported in the press.

By the way, Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to place in the RECORD two indorsements which appeared in the paper this morning and some other excerpts that I have here in connection with my remarks.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, will the gentleman yield for a question before he makes that request?

Mr. BLANTON. Yes; I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER. After a further study of the record of the gentleman's candidate for the Democratic nomination for President and his vote against the submission of the eighteenth amendment, I have found that he follows Bishop Cannon and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], because the RECORD shows he voted for the Volstead Act, and also that he voted for the nefarious Jones law which will put a man in jail for five years for transporting a pint of liquor or a bottle of good beer. So, consequently I can now realize why Senator SHEPPARD, the father of the eighteenth amendment, and Mr. McAdoo, the stepfather of the eighteenth amendment, come out in support of the gentleman's candidate.

Mr. BLANTON. I can not just understand why the gentleman from Wisconsin, who now is one of the floor leaders for the Republican Party, concerns himself so continually about my nominee for the Presidency. The subject is continually in his mind. The great trouble is that none of us have yet been able to get the permission of our Speaker of the House to announce his candidacy. His job of running this House is a stupendous one, and we can not turn him one way or another from his duties. He is confining all of his thought and devoting all of his great abilities to running this House. He and all of us here on this side of the aisle are friends of Governor Franklin D. Roosevelt. And the Speaker is allowing none of us to throw any obstacle in the way of his friend. Naturally we Texans are for JOHN GARNER, but we are doing nothing against Governor Roosevelt. Now I will ask the Chair to put the unanimous-consent request I made.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to say to my friend from Wisconsin that if he will keep a record of it he will find that the man I nominated will get every vote in the gentleman's Wisconsin district except one, because every progressive he represents is going to vote for him.

Mr. SCHAFER. I want to say to the gentleman that his candidate, who has been condemning the delay in the reorganization of and extravagance in the executive departments, also voted for $24,000,000 to be given to the Executive, without restriction, for the purpose of dry enforcement in addition to the regular appropriation.

Mr. BLANTON. That ought to offset the other vote objected to. I want to call the attention of the country to this, that William Randolph Hearst, a notorious wet, indorses the man I nominate, and this morning one of the greatest drys in the United States, William G. McAdoo, indorsed him. And then another wet, Col. R. R. McCormick, indorsed him. So you see he has the indorsement of the wets and drys.

The people of this country believe there is something here besides the liquor question. It is the economic question. If you will get the history of the New Hampshire campaign you will find that our friend ROGERS ran on an economic platform. If you will get the issues up in New Jersey, you will see that our friend STEWART ran on an economic platform, a platform for economy in government, a platform for the Government to act in the interest of the people.

Mr. STEWART. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly.

Mr. STEWART. May I also say that I ran on the proposition of repealing the eighteenth amendment?

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, incidentally; yes.

Mr. STEWART. And for an amendment of the Volstead Act.

Mr. BLANTON. Incidentally; but they did not pay any attention to that. They knew the gentleman had been indorsed by the great Democratic Party, which stands for equal opportunity for everybody, and they elected him because he was a Democrat. They will always do it if they get a fair, square chance at the polls.

Mr. SCHAFER. I interrupted the gentleman when he was asking unanimous consent to insert certain data in the RECORD. I trust the gentleman will not forget to ask unanimous consent to put in the RECORD the indorsement of the father of the eighteenth amendment, Mr. SHEPPARD, and the stepfather of the eighteenth amendment, Mr. McAdoo.

Mr. BLANTON. I am going to do that, and I am going to put in the indorsement of some of the wettest men in the United States, even wetter than the gentleman from Wisconsin.

INDORSEMENT FROM WILLIAM RANDOLPH HEARST—WHO WILL BE THE NEXT PRESIDENT?

In 1912 Champ Clark, a distinguished and a genuine Democrat, came before the Democratic convention at Baltimore with the support of a popular majority and the indorsement of States of the Union which represented a majority of the Electoral College.

Champ Clark was a true Democrat and a tried one.

He had been leader of his Democratic associates in the House of Representatives for three terms.

Under his sound and sincere Democratic leadership a Republican majority of 57 in the House in 1907 had been transformed into a Democratic majority of 65 in 1911.

JOHN N. GARNER, Speaker of the House of Representatives, a position universally pronounced next in importance to the Presidency in this Republic of ours, is a loyal American citizen, a plain man of the plain people, a sound and sincere Democrat; in fact, another Champ Clark.

His heart is with his own people. His interest is in his own country.

God guide us to choose wisely, so that this year of grace 1932 may be a happy new year for us all.

WILLIAM RANDOLPH HEARST.

McADOO BOOMS SPEAKER GARNER FOR PRESIDENT—HAILS TEXAN AS IDEAL LEADER OF PARTY—ALL FACTIONS CAN UNITE BEHIND HIM, AVERS WILSON'S SECRETARY OF TREASURY

LOS ANGELES, February 18.—William Gibbs McAdoo to-day in a formal statement unqualifiedly indorsed Speaker JOHN N. GARNER for the Democratic nomination for President. He said:

"Under GARNER all elements of the party should be able to unite. In that case his election would be certain."

The declaration of Woodrow Wilson's wartime Secretary of the Treasury takes its place at once as the day's most sensational piece of political news, one far-reaching in its influence, nation-wide in its furtherance of the popular demand for GARNER'S nomination.

GREAT FOLLOWING

With a loyal following that extends into every State, McAdoo's declaration for GARNER doubtless will bring into the Texan's camp prominent members of the party all over the country. Many of the Democratic leaders in California are with McAdoo in enthusiastic support of GARNER.

Following is the McAdoo statement:

"I have received so many inquiries as to my attitude toward the forthcoming Democratic presidential nomination that I take this method of answering them.

"I favor JOHN N. GARNER, Speaker of the House of Representatives.

KNOWS HIS ABILITY

"During the six years that I was Secretary of the Treasury, I had, of necessity, close official relations with the Ways and Means Committee of the House, of which Mr. GARNER was a leading member. I came, therefore, to know him intimately and to have the opportunity to judge, under the severe test of complicated problems, the quality of his mind and the measure of his ability.

"I was greatly impressed by his sound argument, by his broad comprehension of political, social, and economic problems, by his integrity—moral and intellectual—and by his high character and practical ideas. His elevation to the Speakership was not a matter of chance but a recognition of 29 years of able and distinguished service in the House of Representatives.

WELL EQUIPPED

"Mr. GARNER has universal knowledge, acquired by hard work and experience, of the problems of Government. He would bring to the Presidency just the equipment that is sorely needed to direct the affairs of the people of the United States in these extraordinary times.

"Moreover, Mr. GARNER is not involved in any party schisms that threaten success on election day. He is beyond the reach of those sinister and subtle influences which work unceasingly against the interests of the masses of the people. He appeals to those elements in our national life which need a leader who understands their problems, whose sympathies are with them because he does understand them, and who, because of heredity and environment, is one of the people himself.

"He will know how to use the Executive power to promote the common good and to suppress favoritism and extravagance and the flagrant forces of privilege and corruption which have brought the country to its present unfortunate condition.

"Under GARNER all elements of the party should be able to unite. In that case his election would be certain."

GARNER BACKED BY MCCORMICK

CHICAGO, February 19.—Support of JOHN N. GARNER, Democratic Speaker of the House, was urged to-day by Col. R. R. McCormick, publisher of the Chicago Tribune, a Republican newspaper.

His indorsement of GARNER'S economy program came in a speech before the Chicago Assembly. He declared GARNER had advocated real measures of economy and that they deserved support of Americans. He also praised Senator GLENN, of Illinois, for his advocacy of economy, and added:

"It is up to the people to support the retrenchment programs advocated by both Speaker GARNER and Senator GLENN. If we rally to their support, we will rescue our country from bankruptcy. We must go to the rescue as fast and as vigorously as possible or it will be too late."

Mr. CLARKE of New York. May I suggest that the gentleman put John's picture in along with his own?

Mr. BLANTON. I think John from Wisconsin will vote for the other John when the time comes.

Now, in conclusion, I want to say this: We are supposed to put in the first deficiency bill just what the President's Budget recommended. They estimated and recommended appropriating $141,031,184, while our Byrns committee appropriated only $126,250,333.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I yield the gentleman five additional minutes.

Mr. BLANTON. I thank my friend, the gentleman from Pennsylvania, very much. You know, I am for Mr. SHREVE even if he is a Republican. He is a most valuable man in this Congress. Mr. SHREVE, Mr. BYRNS, Mr. OLIVER, and my committee, the Appropriations Committee, saved $14,780,850 on that one bill below the estimates of the President's Budget. [Applause.]

The next bill was the agricultural bill. The President's Budget, which is supposed not to propose a cent which the President does not approve, sent in estimates asking us to appropriate $186,243,405. The Appropriations Committee appropriated only $175,443,814. Our good colleague, Judge BUCHANAN, was the able chairman of that subcommittee. He is the man who did the hard work on that bill, and we should give him credit for it. He saved $10,799,000 on that bill. Then there was the Interior bill, which our good friend from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] has just passed through the House. He did splendid work on it as chairman of the subcommittee. The President's Budget recommended that we appropriate $56,705,352. Our committee appropriated only $50,431,432 and thus saved the country $6,273,920.

You take the present bill, which our good friend Mr. OLIVER has now brought to you on the floor after a couple of months of hard work, and upon which Mr. SHREVE has done such valuable work. The President's Budget recommended that we appropriate $129,784,136, yet the bill carries only $124,439,318, a saving below the President's Budget of $5,382,818. Thus far on these four bills your Appropriations Committee, under the guidance of the splendid chairman, Mr. BYRNS, of Tennessee, and the chairmen of the various subcommittees, has saved $37,237,179 below the President's Budget estimates.

That is splendid work. That is constructive accomplishment for the people of this country by the present session of the Seventy-second Congress.

Mr. MICHENER and Mr. SCHAFER rose.

Mr. BLANTON. I yield first to my friend from Michigan and then to my friend from Wisconsin.

Mr. MICHENER. I want to congratulate the Committee on Appropriations, but I want to call also the gentleman's attention to the fact that ever since we have had a Budget in the House, if I am not mistaken, and the gentleman will know if I am mistaken, there has never been an appropriation bill reported but what the Congress has cut the Budget as submitted by the President. So, as a matter of fact, the saving was nothing new.

Mr. BLANTON. I want to say that that is the worst condemnation of the Republican Presidents I have ever heard—every Congress reducing the appropriations below their Budget estimates, and yet during the last 10 years the Budget has grown under the Harding-Coolidge-Hoover triumvirate administration until we have a deficit of $1,200,000,000. This is because of the Budget. The President's Budget has been too big. The President's Budget does not look after the people's interests. The President's Budget is asking for extravagance and is not asking for economy. That is a condemnation of the Budget of the gentleman's Republican Presidents.

Mr. SCHAFER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BLANTON. I yield.

Mr. SCHAFER. We would have had a greater deficit in the Treasury if the plan had prevailed which was advanced by those economy pushers—the gentleman from Texas, Mr. GARNER, the gentleman from Texas, Mr. BLANTON, and the Gentleman from Tennessee, Mr. BYRNS—to foist $24,000,000 additional on the President for prohibition enforcement in the second session of the Seventieth Congress, which amount he had not asked for.

Mr. BLANTON. That is about as unfounded as all the beer statements that the gentleman makes.

Mr. SCHAFER. That is the fact, and the gentleman knows it.

Mr. BLANTON. And the people do not pay any attention to those assertions at all. [Applause.]

I thank my colleagues for their patient hearing.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Indiana, the former chairman of the committee, Mr. WOOD.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I have been listening to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] laying claim to the extraordinary saving that has been made upon the bills of the Appropriations Committee thus far considered below the Budget estimates and I wish to say that since the Budget was adopted there never has been an appropriation bill submitted to this Congress by any of the various subcommittees of the Committee on Appropriations but what, without a single exception, reduced the recommendations of the Budget. [Applause.]

I want to say further, in justice to the President of the United States, and in justice to the splendid chairman that we now have of the Committee on Appropriations, that soon after the organization of this House and after the selection of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] as chairman of the Appropriations Committee, he went down and called upon the President and told him that it was his purpose to stand by him and help him in reducing expenditures. The President thanked him for it and for the splendid cooperation offered, and which he has been practicing, and said to him, then and there, "I want you to cut wherever you think you can cut, and you need not mind the Budget. Cut it wherever you can." [Applause.]

The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] came upon this floor and told you exactly the conversation he had with the President in this regard, and I want to say to you that no matter how deeply you cut, you will be favoring the President and you will meet with no opposition from him by reason of such cuts.

Mr. ADKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. ADKINS. After the recommendations of the Budget have been taken care of, does not this Congress, as well as other Congresses in the past, have under consideration large appropriations, some of which are passed, that are not contemplated by the Budget at all?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The House has never increased the Budget recommendations. The committee has increased certain items, but taking the whole bills, from start to finish, you will find a reduction in every one of them. We are not responsible for what happens at the other end of the Capitol.

It seems to be a general pastime——

Mr. KETCHAM. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question right at that point?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. KETCHAM. Considering the action taken by the House in reducing the estimates of the Budget, has the gentleman at his hand the reduction made by the Budget in its recommendations in comparison with the expenditures of last year, and if the gentleman does not have the figures, will he set out later an exact comparison showing the reduction recommended by the Budget as compared with the accomplishments in the House?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The total Budget estimates for 1932 were $3,993,922,554.31. The total appropriations were $3,964,554,298.95. The appropriations therefore were $29,368,255.36 less than the Budget estimates.

I was about to say that it seems to be a favorite pastime for some gentlemen to criticize the President. If there was ever a time in the House when the President of the United States should have the support of all its Members, it is now. A number of parallels have been drawn by different individuals to existing conditions, comparing the administration of Abraham Lincoln and that of Mr. Hoover. I want to say to you that the trials through which Mr. Hoover has gone and is going are greater, so far as the world is concerned and so far as the United States is concerned in many respects, than the trials through which the immortal Lincoln went. [Applause.]

Lincoln had something to cheer him from time to time when a battle was won for the Union cause. There have been no successful battles thus far of consequence in the battle that this administration is making against the worst depression that the world has ever known. But not only has this administration had to contend with our depression but it has had to contend with the depression all over the world, and three-fourths of the depression we have to-day is caused by the backwash of the depression of the other countries of the world.

At relatively this same time in 1864 Abraham Lincoln was a defeated man as his own successor, and he felt it and said to his friends, "I do not wish to stand for renomination or reelection. I feel that my administration has been a failure. Perhaps, it would be better to place it in other hands where success may be achieved."

He advised, however, that we should not trade horses while crossing the stream. We elected that great and good man to carry on the work that it was ordained that he should finish. I believe that if the American people are wise in this day and generation, they will not trade horses while crossing this stream [applause], and that they will retain this man, who I have no hesitancy in declaring is as eminently fit to be President of the United States as any man who has filled that position. [Applause.]

Now, I wish to correct some statements that were made here yesterday on the floor. It is an easy matter to make an assertion. My good friend from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS] stated in the speech that he made yesterday that President Hoover had appointed more bureaus and commissions than any man that had been President of the United States, and that was echoed by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON].

I have had collected for me the facts in reference to the appointment of these commissions, and I wish to call your attention to the fact that in any business so complex as that of the Federal Government much of the research work is carried out by means of commissions.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. Has the gentleman from Indiana changed his mind about Mr. Hoover since January 13, 1919, when from this floor he then said that Mr. Hoover was the most expensive luxury that was ever fastened upon this country?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I wish to say to the gentleman that at the time I made that criticism the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY] was extolling Mr. Hoover as an almost superman.

Mr. BLANTON. But he has since found him out. We have since found him out. And the people have since found him out.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. And I have since found him out. And had I known him then as I do now, I never would have made it. [Applause.] At that time he was being extolled by the Democrats all over the country as a prospective candidate for President of the United States. The gentleman from Illinois was then lauding and praising this great man, but he has changed his attitude, as evidenced by his interview of yesterday in criticism of the message sent down by the President. The gentleman from Illinois said that the President had made this specific recommendation asking for additional offices to give him more power. The gentleman from Illinois has changed his opinion. Then Mr. Hoover was the greatest man existing, and now he is simply nothing in the eyes of the gentleman from Illinois.

What has transpired to make this man a lesser man, a man of less ability, of less genius, than he was then? He is more capable of doing the business of this country to-day in these trying times than any man, in my opinion, that has ever been President.

In a business so vast and complex as that of the Federal Government, a large part of the research work necessarily is carried out by special commissions and committees, delegated to investigate a given subject and to report to the President, or to Congress. They also act for the coordination of Government activities, recommend policies, represent the Government abroad, or at national functions, and exercise semijudicial or semilegislative powers delegated by the Congress.

Let me repeat what I have said heretofore, that rather than condemn the President of the United States for appointing these commissions, we would better be condemning ourselves, because not one out of a dozen or twenty-five have been appointed by the President, in comparison with those appointed by the Congress of the United States, and the expensive ones are those that have been created by the Congress of the United States.

A great majority of these commissions are created not by the President but by the Congress upon its own motion. All of the commissions created by the President are for temporary nonadministrative purposes as are also a large number of those created by the Congress.

The number of commissions set up under recent administrations are:

President Roosevelt	107
President Taft	63
President Wilson	150
President Harding	44
President Coolidge	118
President Hoover	44

The commissions, committees, or conferences are of three varieties:

First. Temporary bodies created by the President's order for the purpose of coordination of Government activities, or for the determination of facts and advice as to policies on special subjects. These commissions cost the Government nothing.

Second. Commissions or committees created by Congress upon recommendation of the President. The expenses of such committees are paid by appropriation.

Third. Commissions created by Congress on its own motion. These expenses are always paid by appropriation.

During President Wilson's administration approximately one-half of the total of 150 commissions were created by Congress upon its own motion. Of those created by or upon recommendations of the President, 10 are still in existence.

During the Coolidge administration, 74 commissions out of a total of 118 were created by Congress. Of the 44 created by the President or upon his recommendation, 39 have completed their task and have been released.

During President Hoover's administration 24 out of the 44 commissions were created by Congress. Of the 20 created directly by the President, or upon his recommendation, 12 have completed their tasks and have been released, and only 2 are other than temporary. Of the purely presidential commissions, the expenses of 4 have been paid by the Federal Government, while 17 either cost nothing or rely upon public support.

The following are the commissions or committees created under the present administration, classified as those created by Executive order, those created by Congress upon recommendation of the President, and those created by Congress upon its own motion.

COMMISSIONS CREATED BY EXECUTIVE ORDER

1. Committee on Coordination of Veterans' Services: This was an interdepartmental committee and the result of its investigation and report was the consolidation of all veterans' services into the new Veterans' Administration, with the result of an annual saving in expenditures of fully $10,000,000 a year. The committee has completed its work and has been dismissed.

2. Advisory Shipping Committee: This committee was appointed to advise upon the sale of certain steamship lines by the Government and the reorganization of others. The policies recommended have been followed with success. The committee has completed its work and has been dismissed.

3. California Water Commission: This commission was created in conjunction with the Governor of California for the coordination of State and Federal activities in water problems of the State of California. It has cost the Federal Government nothing. The commission has completed its work and has been dismissed.

4. National Drought Committee: This committee was appointed to coordinate Federal, State, and other activities in the matter of drought relief and to recommend a national program. The result of its investigation was recommendations which led to the undertaking of relief by the Red Cross and appropriations by Congress for rehabilitation of agriculture from the drought. It represents no expenditure. The committee has completed its work and has been dismissed.

5. San Francisco Bridge Commission: This commission was appointed in conjunction with the Governor of California to settle the conflict between Federal and State authorities in determination of the location of a bridge across San Francisco Bay. The commission settled this question, which had been a matter of public dispute for over 10 years, and preparations are being made for the construction of the bridge. The commission cost the Federal Government nothing. It has completed its work and has been dismissed.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. PARSONS. The number of commissions appointed to date by the President is 44. Compared with the 150 appointed during the eight years of Mr. Wilson, on the basis of comparison of time, if the same percentage keeps up until the eight years expire in Mr. Hoover's terms, he will have appointed 144. Then we must consider that Mr. Wilson was in during four years of war, when it was necessary to appoint a large number of boards and commissions, so that what the gentleman says could not be taken as a fair comparison.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. We are in a worse condition economically to-day than we were then, and there is perhaps more necessity for appointment of commissions and committees. However, I am glad that the gentleman concedes that Mr. Hoover will have ample time in eight years in the President's office to catch up with the record of Mr. Wilson.

6. Advisory Committee on Veterans' Preference: This committee was set up to determine policies with respect to employment of disabled veterans and the method of preference to be given by Government departments. It made a report and Executive order has been issued placing the recommendations in action. The committee has completed its work and has been dismissed.

7. Advisory Commission on Unemployment Statistics: This commission was appointed to advise the method by which unemployment statistics should be recruited by the Department of Labor under authority of Congress requiring the establishment of such service. The committee has made its recommendations, and they have been placed in action and the committee dissolved. The committee has cost the Government nothing.

8. Emergency Unemployment Committee: This committee was created to coordinate Government activities in employment programs in the depression and secure organization of committees throughout the country through adequate organization of local agencies to take care of distress during the depression. It made an effective contribution to the situation.

9. Interdepartmental Mail Contract Committee: This commission was appointed to coordinate the activities of the Department of Commerce, the Shipping Board, the Army, and Navy in respect to marine mail contracts. It has passed upon and negotiated postal and other contracts which have resulted in agreements for the construction of nearly 500,000 tons of merchant ships. It is still functioning but costs the Government nothing.

10. Research Committee on Social Trends: This commission is engaged in research into various social questions which bear on immigration, hours of labor, and many kindred subjects. Its expenditures are being met by the Rockefeller Foundation.

11. White House Conference on Child Health and Protection: This committee conducted investigations into child health and protection and directed the White House conference on that subject and is engaged in follow-up activities throughout the country. Its expenditures have been met by the A. R. A. children's fund and there has been no expense to the Government. It has made a notable contribution to the welfare of children in coordination of national, State, and local activities. The conference has completed its task except publications.

12. White House Conference on Home Building and Ownership: This committee is engaged in exhaustive investigation of housing conditions, financial and other methods for extension of home building and home ownership. Its expenses are being paid by private subscription and it costs the Government nothing.

13. Advisory Committee on Illiteracy: This committee was created to coordinate the activities of the Federal Government with State governments and private agencies throughout the country in the elimination of illiteracy. It has carried on active campaigns, organized schools for adults, and has greatly contributed to the elimination of illiteracy. It has been supported by private subscription.

14. Council of Personnel Administration: This is purely an interdepartmental committee to establish standards in Federal Government employment.

15. Advisory Committee on Education: This committee is engaged in exhaustive study of problems of coordinating the different Government activities together with those of the States and municipalities in questions of education. The committee's expenditures are being paid by the Rosenwald Foundation.

16. Timber Conservation Board: This committee was created to study and advise on forestry policies, with view to coordination of Federal, State, and private activities in conservation. It is supported by private subscription.

17. Antihoarding Committee: This committee was created by the President in volunteer cooperation with leading business and civic organizations of the country for the purpose of stopping the hoarding of money during the economic depression. It cost the Federal Government nothing.

18. Committee on Abandoned Army Posts: This committee is made up of departmental officials; was appointed to devise means of utilizing Army posts abandoned in the War Department retrenchment program and cost the Federal Government nothing.

19. Committee for the Study of Education in Haiti: This committee was appointed by the Secretary of State and consists of prominent educators in the United States. It is making a study with a view to improving the educational system in Haiti.

20. The President's Unemployment Relief Organization: This commission was set up under Walter S. Gifford as director to cooperate with the States and municipalities in devising ways and means for the relief of unemployment during the winter of 1931–32. It took over the work of the Emergency Unemployment Committee, which was set up at the outset of the economic depression, and has made a very distinctive contribution in the relief of the whole unemployment situation.

COMMISSIONS CREATED BY CONGRESS UPON RECOMMENDATION OF THE PRESIDENT

21. London Naval Conference: This commission negotiated and completed a naval treaty for the limitation of navies. It has saved hundreds of millions of dollars to the American taxpayer and secured parity to the American Navy and brought about better international relationship to both Japan and Great Britain.

22. Federal Power Commission: This commission is a reorganization of the previous departmental commission in order to secure more expeditious and independent action than hitherto. It requires no additional expenditure except for salaries of commissioners.

23. The Haitian Commission: This commission settled the terms of the withdrawal of the United States from Haiti and set up such arrangements within that island as prevented further revolution. This commission has completed its task and has been dismissed.

24. National Commission on Law Observance and Enforcement: This commission has made exhaustive reports on the whole problem of law enforcement and the reorganization of the law-enforcement machinery and the judiciary of the country. The commission in a report said that "Federal participation in enforcement has shown continued improvement since and as a consequence of the act of Congress of 1927 placing prohibition officers under civil service and the act of 1930 transferring prohibition enforcement from the Treasury to the Department of Justice."

25. Commission on Conservation and Administration of Public Domain: This commission has made a report on the conservation of western lands and ranges and recommendations for management and disposal of public lands. Its report has been completed and has been submitted to Congress.

26. The Federal Farm Board: This commission was proposed by both the Republican and Democratic conventions and was recommended by the President for the relief of agriculture. It is permanent and is designed to aid cooperative organizations of farmers to market their crops.

27. Reconstruction Finance Corporation: This organization was created by the Congress, upon recommendation of the President, with assets of $2,000,000,000 to assist in the reconstruction of the normal working of the credit fabric of the country with a view to aiding agriculture and industry in obtaining normal conditions. It is temporary in character.

28. Geneva Arms Limitation Conference: This commission was created by the President, with expenses provided for by the Congress for American participation in the General Arms Limitation Conference which began in Geneva in February, 1932.

29. Tariff Commission: This commission is a reorganization of that provided for under the tariff act of 1922. Reorganization, both in personnel and methods provided for by the Congress in the tariff act of 1930, was made in order to secure more expeditious action in investigating and increasing or lowering tariff duties to meet changing economic conditions.

PUBLIC COMMISSIONS CREATED BY CONGRESS UPON ITS OWN MOTION

30. Interoceanic Canal Board: This board is engaged in a survey of the Nicaraguan Canal.

31. Massachusetts Bay Colony Tercentenary Commission: This commission represented the Federal Government in the celebration in Massachusetts. It has completed its task and has been dismissed.

32. National Memorial Commission: This commission was created by Congress for the erection of a building as tribute to the Negro achievements in America.

33. Iceland—one thousandth anniversary of the Althing: Commission created by Congress to attend the celebration representing the American Government. The commission has completed its task and has been dismissed.

34. Yellowstone National Park Boundary Commission: This commission was created to settle the boundaries of Yellowstone National Park. It has completed its work and its report and recommendations sent to the Congress.

35. Alaska Highway Commission: This commission was created by Congress to make a preliminary survey of the highway from Continental United States to Alaska.

36. Chicago World's Fair Centennial Celebration: Commission created by Congress to investigate and report with reference to the Federal Government's representation and participation in the celebration. Its report is now before Congress.

37. Joint Committee to Investigate Pay Readjustment of Army, Navy, Marine Corps, Coast Guard, Geodetic Survey, and Public Health Service.

38. Universal Draft Commission: Public Resolution 98 (Seventy-first Congress). Commission to study promotion of peace, equalization of burdens of war, and minimization of profits of war.

39. District of Columbia Fiscal Relations: This committee to make full investigation of fiscal relations of the District of Columbia and the United States Government and to report its recommendations to the House.

40. Charleston (S. C.) celebration of two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of founding.

41. Lewis and Clark Expedition celebration.

42. Joint committee to investigate Northern Pacific land grants.

43. Joint committee to attend sesquicentennial celebration of Battle of Kings Mountain, S. C.

44. United States Battle of the Monongahela Commission.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. We can get down to one point upon which we can agree. The President is solely responsible for the White House. The White House for 1921 under President Wilson cost $293,680. For this year, 1932, the White House under President Hoover costs $652,179. What does the gentleman say about that, with 48 policemen paid for by the Government to guard the White House in peace times?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Oh, there was the same number of policemen during the administration of Mr. Wilson, but they were paid for out of another appropriation.

Mr. BLANTON. Not the park policemen.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes; they were.

Mr. BLANTON. The park policemen are not paid by the District but by the Government, and the District has no control over them, and all the White House policemen are park policemen.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. They were paid out of another appropriation. They were not charged up at that time as an expense against the White House at all.

Mr. BLANTON. The White House policemen are Government policemen. The fact remains that the White House expenses under President Hoover for this year are $358,499 greater than they were in 1921 under President Wilson. Does the gentleman, who has been the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, claim that the park policemen are paid for out of the District appropriation? All of the White House policemen are chosen from the park policemen.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. The gentleman has asked the question and I have answered it.

Mr. BLANTON. I do not think the record will bear out the gentleman's statement.

Mr. PARSONS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. PARSONS. The gentleman is making an interesting statement. I think it will be illuminating for the RECORD. Will the gentleman place in the RECORD the amount of salaries paid and the costs of these various boards during the past three years, as compared with the cost of boards in other years?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. If I had the time, I would be very glad to do that, and I do not know what the comparison would show, but I do not have the time. I have been inveighing against bureaus and commissions as loudly perhaps as anybody, and I am in favor of abolishing them as rapidly as possible. I am in favor of the resolution which has been introduced here for the purpose of studying the matter and having the Congress do something that will do that work.

It never will be done until some affirmative action is taken by Congress. Two or three Presidents have appointed commissions for the purpose of studying the manner of getting rid of this overlapping, and the abolishing of various commissions. One of the first things that President Harding did was to appoint such a commission, and the present Postmaster General Brown was the head of that commission. They worked for months and months and finally agreed on a plan, but they could not get two of the Cabinet officers to agree upon it.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for one other question?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. When, on March 4, 1921, President Hoover became Secretary of the Department of Commerce, the annual expenses of his department were then $24,369,069. When he left the Department of Commerce on March 4, 1929, the expenses of the Department of Commerce were $40,049,168, and this year the annual expenses of such department are $54,422,230, which is an increase of $30,000,000 per annum over when Mr. Hoover took charge.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Yes; and I wish to say in answer to the gentleman, that he should have heard Mr. TILSON yesterday; he gave a complete answer to that; and the gentleman from Texas no doubt is largely responsible for that increased expenditure. We have given the Department of Commerce an army of foreign attachés.

Mr. BLANTON. Oh, I was with the gentleman against that. I heard Mr. TILSON's attempted excuses, but I could not agree to them. I fought against all of these increased expenses President Hoover got over for the Department of Commerce.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I am glad to know that, but Congress created them, so that Congress is responsible for that increase in the expenditures in the Department of Commerce, yet here we are blaming Hoover for it.

Mr. BLANTON. Why, he advocated it, and it was at his instance that it was done.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. But we did not have to follow his advocacy.

Mr. BLANTON. I have not been following him. But the House and Senate are following him now every day, on $250,000,000 moratoriums, and on $2,000,000,000 reconstruction finance bills, which will not benefit the real people very much.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I say to the gentleman he will do well to follow the program as laid down by Mr. Hoover. [Applause.] I wish to say in answer to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. RAINEY], when he said the President had offered nothing, had made no suggestion for these things, that the President is the only one who has offered anything practical and constructive. [Applause.] If he has not, what have you upon the majority side been doing? You are charged with the responsibility of legislation; and if you do not care to adopt the recommendations of the President, give us something yourselves. I think you have wisely acted thus far in going along with the President, and it bespeaks well for the patriotism that ought to actuate every Congressman, whether Democrat or Republican. Let us get out of this mire and on to solid ground, and then it will be time to make our political fights.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. The gentleman asks why this side of the House has not done something constructive. From the very beginning the Republicans have said that if the Democrats undertook to do anything it would be considered political and unpatriotic; that we ought to accept the suggestions of the President and follow in his tracks.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Oh, I do not think such a threat as that would scare you into inaction.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Indiana three additional minutes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I wish to say to the gentleman who has just propounded the question that there has been nothing that has come from this side in criticism of anything, nor would there be any criticism of anything that might be offered from that side of the House along lines that have been proposed for the purpose of getting us out of this slough of distress.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Then why does the gentleman ask why something has not been proposed by this side of the House?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. You have the power. Why do you not even make a suggestion?

Mr. FULBRIGHT. For the very reason that you on that side of the House have undertaken to say that anything that has been done on this side would be unpatriotic and for political purposes.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I say to you I never before heard such timidity proclaimed for the Democratic Party.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I yield.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I am very glad to hear the gentleman say he was opposed to these commercial attachés. I fought that vigorously, but did not succeed. But does the gentleman not remember that it came from the Department of Commerce, and it was Mr. Hoover who recommended it?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. I expect it did, and I expect you gentlemen who voted for it——

Mr. LINTHICUM. Oh, I did not vote for it.

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. Well, there was a majority who did. It is just like trying to find somebody to-day who ever offered any criticism of Lincoln. It is impossible to find that man living, and it has been impossible to find him in the last 25 years. Yet he was demeaned, denounced, and calumniated worse than any man who ever was President until the time of President Hoover.

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WOOD of Indiana. No; I do not yield further to the gentleman from Missouri.

I thank you. [Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. COLLINS].

CHEMICAL WARFARE

Mr. COLLINS. Mr. Chairman, the releasing of gas for the purpose of bringing about casualties in war is a recent innovation. The objections to chemical warfare come from two groups of people—the pacifists and the militarists. The pacifists, and a few people who do not call themselves pacifists, object to the slaughter that takes place in war. They are fundamentally opposed to war as such, and therefore protest against chemical warfare. The militarist objects to the use of gas for another reason. When the Spartan, Archidamus, saw a dart fired from a war machine just brought from Sicily, he exclaimed: "Oh, Hercules, the valor of man is at an end!" The modern militarist, in agreement with the Spartan, does not relish the introduction of new methods of warfare. He can not become as enthusiastic over mustard blisters as over the long-recognized and often obsolete methods of warfare that simulate the military doings of knights of old. The truth is that every new weapon has been anathema until it became familiar. Moreover, no weapon has been abandoned once its superior effectiveness to the old has been proven. Based on experience, we may say that chemical warfare has been permanently established as a recognized method of warfare in spite of all attempts by its envious opponents to dislodge it.

Within the last few days there has been considerable discussion here and abroad regarding the advantages and disadvantages of this war weapon. Its abolition has been suggested not merely for the sake of argument but has been, and is now, being seriously considered by technical experts, by those deeply interested in prettier methods of warfare, and by those who favor the total abolition of war. The responsibility now confronts us whether the United States should abandon all hope of protecting its shores by scientific means and agree to repulse all invaders as humanely as possible. In other words, should we agree with those who pretend to humanize war, by eliminating the unpleasant features or by discarding the most effective weapons?

The advantages of chemical warfare in the defense of the United States should not be overlooked.

This is just another incidence of the age-old struggle of the obsolete against progress.

ECONOMIC

The economic effect of the use of chemical warfare is highly important. Up to the present time the loss of material property has been enormous. Devastated areas are not the least of the evils of war. With the development of modern weapons the destruction from war is on the increase. The development of air bombardment and engines of destruction promises to increase the destruction of factories, dwellings, and communications. Modern artillery destroys everything in its path, and high explosives destroy the economic foundations of the area subjected to them. The destruction and devastation in the invaded territory of Belgium, France, Russia, Poland, Rumania, Serbia, Italy, and parts of Austria are probably incapable of exact determination, and it may well be doubted if the exact losses will ever be known.

This property loss on the field of battle and by air raids in the World War was estimated as follows:

Belgium	$7,000,000,000
France	10,000,000,000
Russia	1,250,000,000
Poland	1,500,000,000
Serbia, Montenegro, Albania	2,000,000,000
East Prussia, Austria, Ukraine	1,000,000,000
Italy	$2,710,000,000
Rumania	1,000,000,000
British Empire	1,750,000,000
Germany	1,750,000,000
Total	29,960,000,000

(Bogart, E. L., Direct and Indirect Costs of the Great World War, p. 287.)

Chemical warfare does not bring about material damage. Gas is spread throughout the area, which during the existence of such gas is uninhabitable. But after a comparatively short period, normal economic life may continue at the point where it ceased previous to the conflict.

During the World War not only destruction of property but the dislocation of means of communication and transportation crippled and prolonged the return to a peace basis. Chemical warfare would merely interrupt these channels of communication without the destruction witnessed in the past. Thus, national and international financial, economic, and industrial machinery would resume its peace-time activities, and the distressing reconstruction period, through which we are still passing, would be shortened and less severe. The following clearly expresses the situation:

> Self-interest, as well as humane reasons, demands that warring nations should endeavor to attain their end * * * with the infliction of the least possible permanent injury to life and industry, for the enemy of to-day is the customer of to-morrow. (Hart-Paris.)

Chemical warfare permits the subduing of an enemy without crippling a prospective customer. In this postwar period, when we are suffering from the destruction and dislocation of the last war, we should be in a position to appreciate and welcome any device that would ease conditions should another war be permitted to take place. I do not deny that destruction is inherent in the war system, but I believe that chemical warfare will prevent the ruination of areas over which a battle may be fought.

Chemical warfare is economical in the positive as well as the negative sense. The more efficient the chemical branch of the defense service the less expenditure is required for some other branches. The more thoroughly a country is equipped with adequate chemical defense the less need is there for heavy expenditures on other equipment. This is noticeably true in the case of man power. The mass formations of the past war have gone forever. No longer in the face of modern methods of warfare and the mechanized army can mere troops take any, except a very dependent part, in any future conflict. This country would do well to decrease its personnel, not merely so as to eliminate its military-minded groups but in the interest of efficiency. An increase in the chemical warfare branch would permit this advanced readjustment not only without a loss but, on the contrary, with a positive gain to the national military defense of this country.

(2) If the canal is ever attacked, it will be from either the Atlantic or the Pacific side, from the air, or from the north or south. The three of these could be amply protected with chemicals. An artificial fog could be generated to protect the locks and spillway, and it is estimated that only about 400 tons of mustard gas could completely neutralize the north and south approaches, and at a cost not to exceed $300,000.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. COLLINS. I prefer not to yield.

The carrying on our pay rolls of a hugh number of men prevents the Congress from appropriating sufficient funds for modern implements of war. Not only can not the two be secured and maintained within Budget limitations but one naturally displaces the other. The mere paying, uniforming, and titling of a huge personnel is not in the interest of military preparedness and military efficiency, but actually prevents both. Such preparedness is the preparedness of the backward nations. China has perhaps the world's largest army, but it is not equipped with effective machines, and hence is relatively impotent. Mere numbers, without adequate tanks, airplanes, gas, smoke, machine guns, and other modern effective machines, is a suicidal policy. The two can not be supported and maintained, and the antiquated system must yield to the newer and more effective. Personnel, therefore, must diminish in favor of material.

Second. Chemical warfare is extremely effective from the military point of view. It neutralizes large and important areas and thus prevents occupancy by hostile forces. This is a most valuable asset from the standpoint of defense. Our long coast line, indented by many gulfs and bays, could easily be rendered inaccessible by the proper use of gas. Mustard gas in sufficient quantities put down in advance of an invasion would give us almost complete protection as far as that particular spot was concerned, leaving our mobile forces free to repel an enemy where gas could not be used. Even the operations of a hostile fleet approaching our shores could be materially handicapped by certain kinds of gas released from airplanes by pilots trained in this type of warfare. Although it is presumed that the Chemical Warfare Service would cooperate with the other branches of the defense forces whenever necessary, the value of this branch of the national defense, both as a dependent agency and as an essential defense weapon, can not be overestimated. In addition to the casualty producing agents, smoke has introduced an entirely new factor into the art of war. The development of smoke promises to influence tactics to a very great degree. By means of fast-flying airplanes a curtain of smoke can be laid over wide areas, thereby blotting out visibility of those within the cloud. By means of smoke the firing efficiency of riflemen is cut down to one-twelfth of what it is when vision is clear. Means have been devised also for the purpose of blinding the enemy or concealing the operations of friendly troops or as a smoke screen during naval operations.

Nor can the psychological effect on the invading forces be ignored. An attacking force is effective in direct proportion to the morale of the troops. The constant dread of a gas attack, necessitating as it often does the wearing of masks, and the helplessness, not merely of a few but of whole divisions, paralyzes the attacking troops. No attacking force can possibly gain its objective under such adverse psychological conditions. Chemical warfare is extremely damaging to the morale of the attackers.

HUMANITARIAN

Those who argued that gas was inhumane have long since been driven from that position; the facts carefully and laboriously worked out are now available to anyone who cares to look into the matter.

Chemical warfare has more in its favor than any other weapon used in modern warfare. The object of a war is not the killing of the opposing forces, but merely the subjugation of the hostile will to resist. By the exploitation of mustard gas, as used in the last war, it would be possible to immobilize an army. By the use of the gases developed since the war, it would be possible to render the opposing forces helpless for many hours during which period they could be rounded up.

The Allied armies first came in contact with gas at Ypres on April 22, 1915. On that day, to the men nearer the front, came the "smell of a devilish incense." (Hart, The Real War. 191.) "Soon officers behind the British front and near the canal bridges were startled to see a torrent of terrified humanity pouring backward. The Africans, nearest the British, were coughing and pointing to their throats as they fled; mingled with them soon came horse teams and wagons. The French guns were still firing, but at 7 p. m. these suddenly and ominously became silent." As a result, "the fugitives left behind them a gap in the front over 4 miles wide" * * * and "the two French divisions had almost completely disappeared." "With the aid of gas, the Germans had removed the defenders on the north flank of the salient as deftly as if extracting the back teeth from one side of the jaw." (P. 193.)

Even taking into consideration the fact that the Germans were prepared for this type of warfare and the Allies were not, the effect of gas on the unprepared troops presented an extremely awkward situation, but one which does not appear serious if statistics of the World War are considered.

It appears from a German prospectus, as quoted by Doctor Gilbert in World War Casualties from Gas, that the number of gas casualties was very low, especially during the early years of gas warfare. During the second year of the war there were 6,178 cases admitted to the hospitals, or 1.5 per thousand. During the third year these figures increased to 19,164 admissions, or 3.8 per thousand. In the fourth year, during which mustard gas was used, these figures jumped to 53,321, or 10.6 per thousand. The mortality from gas was 2,280, or 2.9 per cent.

According to the most reliable French figures, there were in the French Army 190,000 men hospitalized from gas, with a mortality of 8,000, or about 4.2 per cent.

The British reported that there were 3,190,235 war casualties in the British and Imperial forces during the war. Of this number, 908,371, or 30 per cent, were killed in battle or died from wounds. There were 1,911,652 listed as missing, many of whom were no doubt killed or died later. Of the total number of casualties, 180,983 became casualties from enemy gas. Of this number, 6,080 died. The above figures show that deaths from gas were but 3.35 per cent as against 31.4 per cent from causes other than gas, or a still larger percentage if we should assume that a liberal share of those missing were killed or died of wounds. In other words, in the British Army shells, bullets, and high explosives caused ten times as many deaths per thousand as gas caused.

A study of the casualties suffered by the American Expeditionary Forces may be made by examining the official report of the Surgeon General of the Army for the year 1920. According to this report, 258,338 men were wounded by war weapons. Of this number, 34,249, or 13.3 per cent, were killed outright or died on the field before they could be removed. The remainder, 224,089 wounded men, were removed to hospitals for treatment. Of the 70,552 gas casualties, only 1,221, or 1.73 per cent, died. Of the 153,537 admitted to the hospitals suffering from bullet wounds, shell wounds, and all other methods of warfare except gas, 12,470, or 8.12 per cent, died. Taking those that died from gas on the field of battle, estimated at possibly 200, and adding the 1,221 who died in the hospitals, there were 1,441 deaths in France from the effects of gas, which, considering the 70,552 hospital casualties produced by gas, shows that barely 2 per cent of the gassed cases died.

Of the remaining casualties, 187,586 who suffered from wounds other than gas, 46,519, or 24.8 per cent died, thus showing that the men who were injured by gas alone on the field of battle had in the American Army twelve times as many chances of recovery as the man wounded with bullets, and so forth. This figure for our Army is slightly better than the British, due, no doubt, to the fact that the British Army experienced the gas attacks before devices for gas protection were constructed.

A further and more detailed comparison of the deaths from war weapons may be seen from the following table:

War chart showing hospitalized casualties during the war, causative agents, etc.

Weapons	Hospitalized casualties		Deaths
	Number	Per cent
War gas	70,552	31.4	1,221
Gun, miscellaneous	74,883	33.4	7,474
Shrapnel	33,787	15.0	1,985
Shells	17,439	7.8	1,703
Sabers	12		3
Grenades	880	.4	56
Bayonets	235	.1	4
Falling bodies	3,148	1.7	83
Rifle balls	20,430	9.1	961
Pistol balls	242	.1	13
Unknown	2,491	1.2	188
Total	224,089		13,691

But those people who maintain that gas is inhumane, when presented with the actual figures of war deaths from gas, emphasize the postwar period. It is stated that the after effects of gas are more serious and less humane than the actual effects on the field of battle. This is to an extent disproven by the table just given which was prepared from data assembled in 1928.

It behooves us, however, to investigate these charges. According to those most violently opposed to the use of chemical warfare, gassed men suffer from blindness, tuberculosis, and throat infections, due directly or indirectly to gas. The facts as presented by the experts on the subject, those men who have spent their time and energy since the World War investigating and caring for these cases, should be considered.

Eyesight impairment

Nature of disability	Kind of gas
	Unknown	Mustard	Total
Loss of right eye	2	2	4
Loss of sight of right eye	7	5	12
Loss of sight of left eye	8	2	10
Loss of sight of both eyes	3	1	4
Loss of sight one eye, unknown	2		2
Loss of eye, side unknown		1	1
Total	22	11	33

Blindness due to weapons other than gas

Nature of disability	Weapon
	Rifle	Shell	Shrapnel	Hand grenade	Gunshot, miscellaneous	Others	Total
Loss of right eye	13	40	89	6	64	6	218
Loss of sight of right eye	10	24	17	5	23	10	89
Loss of left eye	19	43	72	7	77	5	223
Loss of sight of left eye	6	14	27		17	2	66
Loss of both eyes	3	6	4	1			14
Loss of sight of both eyes	1	16	6	1	4	2	30
Loss of eye, side unknown	1	12	8		7		28
Loss of sight, side unknown	3	9	10		8	1	31
Loss of sight due to other conditions	5	22	21	6	19	7	80
Total	61	186	254	26	219	33	779

Blindness due to gas (4 per cent)	33
Blindness due to weapons other than gas (96 per cent)	779
Total cases of blindness	812

From the above table it may be seen that 33 men, or 4 per cent, suffered the loss of the sight, partially or wholly, from gas; whereas 779, or 96 per cent suffered as a result of weapons other than gas. And bear in mind that nearly one-third of our casualties was due to gas.

ARMS AND LEGS

In the Military Surgeon for November, 1925, General Gilchrist, basing his figures on the report of the Surgeon General of the Army for the year 1920, has pointed out that concerning casualties other than those attributed to gas, it appears that 4,428 soldiers lost one or more legs or arms, 4,719 had the flexibility of one or more joints totally or partially destroyed, thus leaving them cripples for the remainder of their lives. No such mutilations were caused by gas.

LUNGS

Recent medical literature has devoted a great deal of space to the aftereffects of the various gases on the human system. One of the most noted studies is by Dr. Robert S. Berghoff who based his data on the observations made of about 2,000 cases which he studied in his capacity as review examiner on the medical examining board at Camp Grant, Ill. The cases were not merely studied from the records but the individuals were encouraged to supply the necessary details, and thus the medical examiners felt reasonably certain of the correctness and authenticity of the classification actually established.

Doctor Berghoff describes the gas attacks as follows:

Gassing occurred in one of two distinctly different ways. The first, which was most common in the early days of the war, was through the medium of gas attack—laying down of a barrage, followed by a "gas cloud." This gas cloud or "drift gas," as it was originally known, consisted of chlorin or chlorin plus a synthetic compound. As the war progressed drift attacks for diverse reasons were modified and to a more or less degree replaced by high-explosive shells. In our observation of 2,000 cases we encountered 240 men who sustained their gas poisoning through cloud or drift gassing, the remainder through high explosives. The gases of the high-explosive shells were of several varieties.

GROUP 1. GAS SUSTAINED IN CLOUD OR DRIFT ATTACK

Number	Chlorin	Mustard	Phosgene	Chloropicrin	Mixed	Time in hospital	Cough	Finding
							Per cent	Per cent
240	240					4 months	60	8

GROUP 2. GAS SUSTAINED THROUGH HIGH-EXPLOSIVE SHELLS

280	280					3 months	25	3
741		741				11 weeks	20	4
186			186			9 weeks	28	3.5
38				38		5 weeks	17	1.5
515					515	10 weeks	23	3

We have prepared a table for the comparative study of these gases and have divided the table into two distinct groups. Group 1 includes those men who sustained their poisoning through cloud or drift attacks, the type of gas being chlorin. Group 2 includes the remainder, all those subjected to high-explosive gassing. The latter group includes mustard gas as the most important numerically, chlorin as equally important because of its severity and toxicity, phosgene, chloropicrin, and a mixed gas. Our table offers not only a list of gases encountered, with the number of cases in each list, but offers also a comparative study of the severity of each type, the symptoms complained of, the length of hospitalization of the individuals. The more important gases will be gone into in detail, chlorin being given the greatest attention, because of its frequency and severity. The table shows unmistakably that cases of chlorin gas poisoning in Group 1, the men subjected to cloud attack, were more severe, called for longer hospitalization, showed more extensive physical findings, and threatened a more protracted convalescence than did the chlorin cases of Group 2, the men subjected to chlorin through high-explosive shells.

In a lecture on gas poisoning Mr. Hill states that—

There seems no reason why recovery of the lungs should be any less perfect after chlorin poisoning than it is after broncho-pneumonia.

Mr. Hill based his study on the cases under observation one to four days after the attack. Based on observations three and four months later, Doctor Berghoff stated:

We, too, feel that there is no apparent reason why these subjects should not regain normal respiratory function and rid themselves of their gradually disappearing symptoms.

The 2,000 cases at Camp Grant were divided into three groups: Normal, bronchitis, and emphysema. However, even in the normal group, Doctor Berghoff states:

There is oftentimes a complaint of cough, shortness of breath on exertion, all of which presents a disconcerting problem. With the complaint of respiratory distress and without definite physical findings, and no apparent pathology, we have no guide toward a logical prognosis.

In considering the prognosis of a disease or condition in which marked subjective symptoms are contracted with meager or entirely absent physical findings, Doctor Berghoff remarks that—

We are seriously handicapped, and our conclusions must be more or less conjecture. This is especially so if we are denied the help of past experience. In our review of 2,000 gas cases we are confronted with just this difficulty. Nevertheless, we have, after careful individual and group examination and comparison, arrived at conclusions:

(1) That gas victims, irrespective of type of gas and severity of attack sustained, show no marked predisposition toward active pulmonary tuberculosis or toward the reactivation of a healed or quiescent pulmonary lesion.

(2) That gas victims present little evidence of material destruction of lung tissue.

(3) That gas victims with emphysema findings have a more protracted convalescence than have those of the bronchitic group.

It is a common belief on the part of the public that tuberculosis is a necessary consequence of gas poisoning. This matter came before a select committee of the Senate on investigation of the United States Veterans' Bureau in 1924. Dr. A. P. Franchine, whose testimony can not be ignored, was, previous to the war, associate professor of medicine at the University of Pennsylvania, where he taught largely on tuberculosis wards and from tuberculosis cases. For 15 years he was visiting physician to the department of tuberculosis of the Philadelphia hospital and on the staff of the Phipps Institute for the Study and Treatment of Tuberculosis, and chief of the State tuberculosis clinic in Philadelphia from its foundation in 1907.

Doctor Franchine went to France as division tuberculosis specialist at first, attached to the Twenty-seventh Division, and later as consultant in gas to the Fourth Army Corps, where he was not only in touch with the administrative and executive work in gas but was assigned as chief of the staff at a gas hospital, a 1,000-bed hospital. Doctor Franchine, before the Senate committee, stated:

The percentage of death from gas was less than 2 per cent. And I went to the post-mortem room every day and examined the lungs. I was not so interested in the effects of gas elsewhere, after I once knew it, but I examined the lungs to see whether there were latent tuberculosis lesions; that is, lesions that do not give symptoms, such as any of us here may have, and whether there was any evidence of these lesions, pathologically, having been lit up by this more or less intensive inflammation. I do not mean at the time of the gassing but I mean following gassing, when one would expect it. While we were being rushed—and too rushed—to keep records, I suppose I can say that I saw then 100 to 125 posts. In a number of these cases it was perfectly and palpably evident to a man of pathological training that there were healed, nonactive lesions, which is not an uncommon occurrence, as you know. It is considered that probably 60 to 90 per cent of people have at one time or another had a tuberculosis infection. But these palpable latent lesions showed no evidence of activity, or reactivation, from 4 to 6 to 10 weeks after the acute inflammation which is supposed to give rise to tuberculosis.

Not only did this specialist on warfare gas and tuberculosis positively state that gas did not produce tuberculosis but he went even farther by testifying that gassing may have the effect of preventing tuberculosis. Thus he states:

I believe that so far from producing tuberculosis—anybody might indeed think so on account of the local irritation in the lungs and bronchi—gas may tend to prevent tuberculosis; its primary action is to produce congestion of the lungs. In fatal cases it causes severe inflammation followed by congestion and edema and prevents the aeration of the blood and quickly smothers, so to speak, the patient. He can not get air into his lungs or blood. When the man drowns or smothers, he is suffering primarily from that inflammation caused not by a germ but a chemical. We know that a nonbacterial congestion or hyperemia is a favorable factor in tuberculosis. In other words, if we could produce locally in the lungs a congestion, we could go far toward curing tuberculosis. People with heart disease, that type of heart disease known as mitrol stenosis, where there is an increase of the blood in the lungs, do not suffer from tuberculosis. When I say that I mean not generally; I mean it is exceptional.

Based on his experience in the hospitals in Philadelphia, he expressed his opinion that gas tended to prevent tuberculosis, and then he continued:

Further, it has been claimed clinically that men who have tuberculosis and have been gassed run a more favorable, slower more indolent course, are better off over the same period of time, improve more than the same type of cases having tuberculosis but who have not been gassed.

Major General O'Ryan at this Senate committee hearing gave the result of 200 personal letters to medical officers requesting that they express their views regarding the relationship existing between tuberculosis and warfare gassing. Forty-one per cent did not reply; 47 per cent were of the opinion that, as a rule, there was little or no connection between the two; 12 per cent stated that a relationship existed.

Of the replies received from 30 medical officers associated with Government hospitals where ex-soldiers were being treated for tuberculosis, 25 stated that with few exceptions there was no connection between gassing and tuberculosis. This statement was based on 16,575 cases. Five medical officers, basing their statement on 2,030 cases, were of the opinion that there was a relationship between tuberculosis and gassing.

In reply to a questionnaire sent to medical associations in the United States, 84 per cent were of the opinion that there was no relationship existing and 16 per cent were of the opposite view.

It is evident that although there is a difference of opinion on the subject, even among medical men who have been in touch with the World War cases, the accepted and preponderant opinion is that there exists no connection between gassing and tuberculosis.

It is believed that in gas cases where tuberculosis was found the disease existed prior thereto and that the physicians who formerly believed a connection between the two existed failed to note the prior existence of tuberculosis.

It is commonly thought that a connection exists between throat trouble and gassing. The testimony of Doctor Franchine on this subject is as follows:

The throat clears up very quickly, just as the eyes do. I mean that men are burned and almost blinded by gas but that clears up; that leaves no scars at all. That is true of the throat, too. When you bring up the question as to whether inflammation does not reduce the normal vitality of the tissues and render them more subject to infection, I should answer yes, subject always to very definite exceptions. And, as I have been able to hint here, I would put down tuberculosis as one of those exceptions. I do not believe gassing, acute or chronic (in industry), does render more susceptible to tuberculosis. But one would have to admit that the pathological and physiological principle holds good, that when any tissue is injured its resistance is reduced, and therefore is more liable to infection. But, of course, there are exceptions, and particularly in an ultimate sense.

Doctor Franchine stated that gassing in some cases would lead to chronic bronchitis which might presumably last three or four years but which would improve slowly. This chronic bronchitis he described as something like a catarrhal condition. It is a thickening or alteration of the mucous membrane, with, as a rule, increased congestion and secretion.

He further emphasized the fact that even in the cases where the patient developed tuberculosis that he did not develop tuberculosis of the throat as readily if gassed as the ungassed patients. This conclusion has been reached also by Dr. H. H. Cole, as set forth in the June number, 1923, of the American Review of Tuberculosis.

Doctor Franchine firmly maintained that there was no direct connection between tuberculosis and gassing, but that gas might so impair a person's resistance and reduce his health that he would be subject to tuberculosis. According to this authority most service men who contracted tuberculosis assume that gas was the cause of their condition, and public opinion has thus been misinformed on this subject without knowing the facts.

Gen. H. L. Gilchrist, the very efficient chief of the Chemical Warfare Service, stated the following conclusions after 2,000 cases had been examined by the board of medical officers:

(1) That gas victims, irrespective of the type of gas and severity sustained, showed no marked predisposition toward active pulmonary tuberculosis or toward the reactivation of a healed or quiescent pulmonary lesion.

(2) That gas victims presented little evidence of material destruction of lung tissue. General Gilchrist stated also the conclusions reached by the Chemical Warfare Service after a thorough investigation, during which records in the different governmental services and 1,200 records filed in the Veterans' Bureau were scrutinized and thousands of letters from medical men, physicists, and chemical manufactures, both in this country and in Europe, were examined.

The conclusions were as follows:

(1) That a large number of individuals were undoubtedly substandard in the beginning and would quite probably have broken down under any stress or strain.

(2) That the generally unknown effect of warfare gases has furnished many individuals a peg upon which to hand all manner of symptoms.

(3) As to the incidence of pulmonary tuberculosis resulting from exposure to gas, it would seem that it is far from convincing that gas played any particular rôle in this connection, and it is doubtful if the incidence of lung tuberculosis among ex-service men is much greater by reason of the part that gas played.

General Gilchrist stated that—

It is generally accepted by the leading practitioners of the world that there is absolutely no connection between the actions of warfare gases and tuberculosis. I believe we are prepared to go a step farther and make the statement that instead of these gases being responsible for tuberculosis, they do, to a certain extent prevent it, which statement is based on developments following the war and on laboratory findings.

Obviously, if the real purpose in a war is the production of casualties, it should be done by the most humane, and at the same time the most effective method. In the same way as gas guns and an extensive use of gas is now employed as the most humane and advanced method of handling criminals and disorders within a country, it is most probable that the gas method of warfare will be used to protect our own shores.

On this humanitarian phase of chemical warfare Capt. Liddell Hart, the most outstanding authority to-day on modern warfare, who saw service in the last war, states:

To inflict widespread death and destruction is to damage one's own future prosperity, and, by sowing the seeds of revenge, to jeopardize one's future security. Chemical science has provided mankind with a weapon which reduces the necessity for killing and achieves decisive effects with far less permanent injury than in the case of explosives. Gas may well prove the salvation of civilization from * * * collapse in case of another world war. (Paris, or the Future of War.)

I do not want to be misunderstood in this matter. I have no desire to portray a playful war. I do maintain, however, that gas is not any more horrible, in fact, not as horrible, as older and more cherished weapons and modes of warfare. That gas in the last war killed people, produced casualties and invalids, and finally, in some cases, a lingering death, I do not deny. But that gas produced as many deaths, or invalids, as the other hoary and beloved weapons I positively do deny. Gas has been grossly libeled. Objections to its use will continue to come from those in military establishments who are too old to modernize themselves or have become stagnated by studying war methods now listed as antiquated; by civilian militarists, the world's worst jingoes, who fancifully follow the disciples of a dead past; by those well-intentioned but misinformed persons, who still believe that future wars will be fought by the same methods as the last; and, finally, by a great many upright men and women who have been led to believe that chemical warfare is more to be dreaded than the plagues of the past and more terrible in its consequences than any of the devilish devices that man's brain has invented to bring on human suffering and destroy human life. Most people object to the use of gas when they really should object to the institution of war. If war must come—war which never settled any question, but has created many new ones, if this mass murder is to continue—let us use the most efficient, most humane, and most economical weapon in carrying on the struggle.

We call ourselves a peaceful Nation, interested in all that pertains to peace. All nations, including ourselves, have renounced war as an instrument of national policy, and we possess an added advantage in not having an enemy in existence. Yet all nations have retained their armaments. As long as the world is in this condition we are entitled to maintain armaments for the defense of our shores in the most economical and most efficient method possible. This would involve a system whereby we would have adequate defense with the minimum of dislocation in our national life. It would involve the elimination of the weapons of a bygone age and personnel and the substitution, slowly but surely, of modern weapons and modern methods of warfare. We should, therefore, agree to budgetary limitation in the sense now understood by all nations, not a comparison of costs between nations, but that a nation's budget for a future period would bear a definite ratio to the budget for the past few years. This system of limitation would decrease the possibility of a nation's fear of its neighbor and lead to a more settled world in which peaceful pursuits could be followed. To this system, if unanimously agreed to by the nations, we should agree, but we must retain the right of deciding how this budget will be apportioned so as to secure the most effective and economical expenditure for national defense.

It is difficult to see how those interested in our national defense would want to rule out effective means of defense, the elimination of which would be to the detriment of our scientific and industrial people.

Our war power must depend primarily on our economic, industrial, and scientific capacity. To throw this overboard would be an extremely backward step as long as the institution of war exists.

The objections on the part of some governments are based on the belief that geographically they are exposed to unscrupulous nations and industrially unfitted to compete with their neighbors in the manufacture of gas. The United States, as a member of the community of nations, is, as usual, desirous of cooperating with the other nations, not only in eliminating the seeds of war but of the most barbarous features of war, should a conflict, in spite of peace machinery and the will to peace, actually take place. But although not contemplating future conflict, I feel that national defense can be most effectively and economically maintained by the development of our chemical-warfare service. This service is capable of forging a defense weapon by which the people of this Nation may feel secure and may follow their peaceful pursuits without any fear of a fantastic enemy. [Applause.]

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. NOLAN].

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to make a few observations on a subject that has been more or less under discussion, and that is how to reduce the cost of Government so as to relieve the burden of the taxpayer. It must be obvious to everyone that no government can function successfully that fails to balance its budget.

It is one of the important problems that faces this Congress, not only to find sufficient revenues to meet the Treasury deficit but so to arrange the fiscal affairs of the Government that in the future the outgo will not exceed the income. I have sympathy for the Ways and Means Committee in its effort to find additional revenue and at the same time meet the strenuous opposition that is put forth against any new methods of taxation.

No one ever willingly or cheerfully pays taxes. Even in prosperous times there is grumbling and opposition to taxes. In times of stress such as we are now experiencing this opposition becomes more pronounced and articulate. There is no doubt that we have gone through a period of wild spending and extravagance in both private and public expenditures. The Government has only been keeping pace with what everyone was doing. From the township to the Nation we were all infected with the same virus.

New governmental activities were created and existing ones were widely if not sensibly expanded, and we now realize the wisdom of the old adage that he who dances must pay the fiddler, and the time has come to pay. And the business man, the farmer, and everyone who sees his resources depleted and his income reduced to the vanishing point must furnish the money to pay with, for the Government can find the money in only one way, and that is through taxation.

There is a decided resentment on the part of the people who have to pay. They are giving more attention to their Government than ever before, and wondering whether the return is worth the price. The opposition to high taxes amounts to almost a revolution. In Minnesota the taxpayers have been storming the courthouses by the thousands and demanding a reduction in the cost of the Government. Business men are holding meetings and passing resolutions insisting that governmental expenses be reduced and all unnecessary activities be eliminated.

I presume every Member of this House has been deluged with letters and resolutions along this line. I know my mail has been decidedly increased because of it.

There has been much agitation and propaganda that has contributed to this state of mind. A great deal of misinformation about the Government has been circulated. The shortcomings of the Government have been exaggerated and in many instances a distorted and unfair presentation of alleged facts has gone out to inflame public resentment.

In spite of this, anyone who has made any careful study of government, local, State, and national, knows there are sufficient grounds for resentment. I know that Congress has tried to meet this situation, that the House has made drastic cuts in appropriations, but this has not always been done with full knowledge of the facts. And I say this in no spirit of criticism. The members of the Appropriations Committee are as hard working and earnest a group as there is in the House, but they have no means of getting to the facts. Those who appear before the committee are those who advocate increased appropriations or want to hold on to existing appropriations. Department and bureau chiefs have only the highest praise for their respective activities, and any one of them will modestly admit that his department or bureau is the most important and should be the last to be cut.

If there has been any carefully considered program, it has not been in evidence, and whatever has been saved has been more than absorbed by the additional expenditures made necessary by the program of reconstruction and relief.

Some of the criticism, both in and outside of Congress, has been directed to the publication of bulletins by the various departments and distributed throughout the country under the frank. The contention is that some of these publications are unnecessary and even actually foolish, that they perform no public service and only tend to discredit the serious purpose of the Federal Government. That there is ground for this criticism can be easily shown by reading some of these bulletins. I do not believe they were written with any intention of being funny. The chances are that they were written by some one who has no sense of humor and who believes that the average intelligence of the American people is not above the kindergarten age.

I might suggest that some of these critics occasionally look over the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. They will probably find that that publication is filled with extraneous matter; that the actual speeches or statements of Members are buried under a mass of junk which has no place in such a publication. It reflects upon the good sense and intelligence of the bodies which permit it. I know that each body is a law unto itself when determining what shall go into the RECORD. Unfortunately, one body can not control the actions of the other in this respect.

This, however, does not get to the real issue. Eliminating these unnecessary publications will not materially reduce expenditures.

There has been much talk of reorganizing the Government in the interest of efficiency and economy. This is a subject that has been agitated and discussed for many years. We know that a few years ago Congress created a joint committee to make a survey along this line; that that committee made a very comprehensive report, to which Congress gave no serious consideration.

President Hoover has been an outstanding advocate of reorganization, and in his recent message to Congress again reiterated his position on this subject and emphasized the need of such reorganization in the interest of efficiency and economy. I was surprised at the criticism of the message coming from the Democratic side of the House. This is not a party question and should not be. It is a common-sense business proposition that should be handled without injecting party politics into its consideration.

There are bound to be differences over methods or details; but it would seem, in view of the disinterested partiotic spirit so far shown by the membership of the House in considering important legislation, we should continue in that same spirit to solve this, one of our most difficult problems.

I believe the most important proposal that the President has made is that he be clothed with sufficient authority to reorganize these departments within themselves—to clean house and throw out a lot of unused and outworn furniture.

The mere reassembling of governmental activities does not get at the situation at all. It may make for greater efficiency, but there is nothing based upon past experience to indicate that it will make for greater economy. Trimming and pruning here and there may help but will not cure the situation. We must go to the very roots and dig up and destroy superfluous and unnecessary activities.

Congress can do a great deal on its own accord by consolidating departments and by investigations, but I submit that if anything worth while is to be accomplished, you will have to follow some such plan as recommended by the President. If you follow his suggestions, you will impose upon him a tremendous task, a job worthy of a Hercules.

When it comes to the power of resistance, there is nothing that equals the resistance of an officeholder who is in danger of losing a soft job. The screams that will go up will be long, loud, and heart-rending.

Nothing can be accomplished in actual reduction of expenditures without separating a number of people from the pay roll. I might suggest some things that could be considered in connection with this problem.

I understand, for instance, that practically every department maintains a statistical department. It would seem reasonable that one statistical department could handle this work.

The departments could help by establishing economies within themselves, which, apparently, they will not do for fear it may result in reduction of their appropriations. Several instances have been called to my attention wherein the Government might save money in the construction and maintenance of its public buildings, but those in authority usually turn a deaf ear to any such proposals.

This Congress has had before it several proposals to investigate the Federal Farm Board; and I submit that if there is any governmental activity that should be investigated, it is the Federal Farm Board. I have been unable to obtain from its reports any information regarding its operating that means anything. Generalities and a mass of figures do not tell the story. I believe that if we should abolish the board, it would give greater relief to agriculture than has ever been obtained under its operations.

The time has come for action. I do not believe the public that is aroused on this subject will be satisfied unless something concrete and definite is done. One realizes the magnitude of the task when one surveys the bureaucratic monster that has grown up in our midst, and the thought of attacking it becomes appalling. Bureaucracy is all powerful, its ramifications reach everywhere, its beneficiaries are legion, and it even at times overshadows and overpowers Congress.

This is a subject, as I said before, that has been under general discussion, but it has now become a good deal like the weather about which Mark Twain said everybody talks about it, but nobody does anything about it. I respectfully suggest to the majority of the House, who control the legislation that will come before the House, to bring out something along the line suggested that we may have an opportunity to act upon some constructive legislation that will help to reorganize the Government, eliminate its unnecessary activities, and thereby help the taxpayer. [Applause.]

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. SWING].

Mr. SWING. Mr. Chairman, the next big problem which must be taken up by Congress is the finding of new sources of revenue to meet the present deficit in the Public Treasury.

The Ways and Means Committee has before it the earnest proposal of the domestic-oil industry to place a tax on imported oils and by-products. The proposal, if adopted, will make a substantial contribution in revenue to the amount necessary to meet the annual Government expenses and at the same time give relief to a basic American industry which is now being ruined by a flood of cheaply produced foreign oil.

The prosperity of 11 and more States is vitally affected by the disaster which has overtaken this industry.

Something must be done, and done quickly, if the American oil industry is to be saved. I hope the proposal for a tax on foreign oil will be favorably acted upon. [Applause.]

I wonder if some of us have not forgotten that one of the original principles of the Federal Government, as expressed in the Constitution, "to promote the general welfare." We have been so busy cultivating an international viewpoint and have been so concerned about the possible opinions which might be held concerning this Nation by other countries and have placed so much emphasis upon the need of reconstructing the industrial situation in foreign lands that I fear many of us have forgotten that the principal and one of the original purposes for which we established our Federal Union was "to promote the general welfare," not of some foreign land or of some foreign people but of the people of our country.

At this time in our national life when we are all thinking about the career, the achievements, and the wise utterances of George Washington, it may not be amiss to call attention to the warning he uttered in the dawning days of the Republic against foreign entanglements. We are to-day so entangled financially, as well as diplomatically, with other lands that we are probably placing the accent upon international responsibilities rather than upon domestic duties.

For a long time we placed our emphasis upon foreign trade. Our industry rather felt that it was imperative that we should develop to the very farthest possible degree the markets of the world. We assumed that our own home markets would be ours without any especial attention. We spent large sums of money in research and in study of the possibilities of foreign markets, and advertised widely in other lands in order that these countries might take the surplus of American goods. To-day those foreign markets have either vanished or are fast vanishing. Every nation in the world is passing through a period in which it places prime importance upon the purchase and consumption of home products. American goods no longer flow in a steady stream to all the ports in the world. When we do enter those ports we are confronted with local conditions and local psychology which amount almost to an embargo. In many cases nations have adopted ratios requiring the use of certain proportions of home products with the smaller end of the ratio allotted to goods produced outside their own country. This has affected many American manufacturers.

At the very time when American products are the victims of deliberate discrimination by so many other nations, we find the unusual situation of groups of American manufacturers opposing the reconstruction of an American industry, which involves the retention of the purchasing power of about 20,000,000 American people, on the ground that they prefer present conditions to continue in order that they may strive for foreign markets rather than strengthen and stimulate the home markets for their goods. It seems almost incredible that this should be true. It is true, however. I would like to call the attention of Congress to a letter published in the People's Forum of the Boston Traveler for Saturday, February 6, 1932. This letter was, as is stated, written in appreciation of an editorial in the same paper.

The editorial assumed that, because the mid-continent section of the country, especially the oil-producing States with their population of one-fifth of the total population of the country, were no longer purchasing New England goods in the same quantity as in former years, this situation was due to a deliberate boycott because of New England's attitude upon the proposed oil tariff. Actually the loss of these western markets has been due to the impoverishment of the people residing in these oil-producing States and relying, as they were forced to do, upon the principal industry, which was the production of petroleum, now prostrated. Because of the influx of cheap foreign oil admitted duty free, about 20,000,000 people, who had formerly been among the very best customers for the products of our industrial States, have so reduced their purchases, because of their own lack of employment, that eastern factories have either closed or have been forced to curtail their operation. There is no boycott in this. Many a hungry man keeps out of a restaurant because he has no money, but we do not call that a boycott. Neither is there a boycott when the conditions fostered by the admission of cheap foreign oil have practically ruined the western market for New England's goods.

There are those who do not understand this situation. The writer of this letter does not see in the loss of the western market anything but an assault upon the manufacturers he represents. Therefore he writes the following:

PEOPLE'S EDITOR: I trust you will pardon me for not having written you sooner in appreciation of the splendid editorial which appeared in Tuesday night's Boston Traveler, entitled "Boycotting New England."

Of course, we are not at all frightened by the threat of a boycott on New England goods. Even if it should prove effective, as, of course, it will not, we feel very strongly that the Latin-American market, to which there were shipped in 1931 between $700,000,000 and $800,000,000 worth of products manufactured in the Nation, is worthy of greater consideration than the rather limited market represented by the States of Oklahoma, Texas, Louisiana, and New Mexico, where this threatened boycott had its origin.

Of course, we are deeply concerned regarding the continuance of the good will which has hitherto existed in trade relationships between our manufacturers and consumers in Latin America. The people of the latter countries feel very keenly this new assault on the principal resource in those nations. We gave them a slap in the face when the Hawley-Smoot tariff bill was enacted, and if we now deliver a blow in the solar plexus, I do not know what will become of some of our manufacturers, who it is apparent must rely on the Latin American outlet for a large percentage of their production.

Tariff barriers to the European countries have materially curtailed foreign shipments and it seems as if it was the opinion of some men in Congress that we ought to dry up the outlets to the countries south of us. If they succeed in their purpose, they will simply add to the length of the period of depression.

O. L. STONE,
General Manager Associated Industries of Massachusetts.
BOSTON.

The vital point in this letter is not the misconception concerning the disappearance of the western market for New England's goods, nor the suggestion that only the four States mentioned are oil-producing States in which the effect of the prostration of the American oil industry has been felt. It is the rather naïve theory that it is more important for manufacturers to promote trade with Latin America than with 20,000,000 people in our own country.

Either Mr. Stone errs or else the Department of Commerce errs in the estimate made of shipments of manufactured products to Latin America. The full data for 1931 are not available. The following figures are available for 1930 and are probably in excess of those for 1931:

The United States Department of Commerce gives $44,406,000 as the total value of semimanufactured goods and $257,436,000 as the total of American products shipped to South America, while Mexico imported from the United States $42,829,000 worth of semimanufactures and $216,143,000 worth of manufactured goods in 1930, the figures for 1931, so far as obtainable, being even lower. Venezuela, the source of so much of the foreign oil brought into this country, imported in 1930, $2,314,000 worth of semimanufactures and $25,130,000 worth of finished manufactures. The trade is hardly to be weighed in the balance against the home market of the oil-producing States west of the Mississippi.

Even if it were true, as it is not, that Latin America offers a larger market than over 20,000,000 people in the midcontinent area of the United States, surely we have some duties and obligations to our own people. If we are going to reduce to pauperism one-fifth of the Nation in order that the manufacturing interests along the eastern seaboard shall prosper, then we must be prepared for economic and political upheavals such as have never yet occurred in this Nation, although they have occurred elsewhere in the world. There is a certain implication in Mr. Stone's letter which we may assume is typical of some of these tariff beneficiaries who do not want others to profit by the only tariff which can protect their interests. Mr. Stone is concerned about the good will between his manufacturing group and Latin-American consumers. He says:

The people of the latter countries feel very keenly this new assault on the principal resources in those nations.

He developed the same point still further in a letter which he wrote to another organization of the Associated Industries, in which he says:

It is a matter of fact and record that the main source of taxation in the Latin-American countries comes from the development of the oil fields in these localities, and should the supply of petroleum and refined products be automatically shut off by the United States Government placing a tariff or an embargo on these raw materials, it certainly would very vitally affect the exports of Atlantic seaboard manufacturers to Latin-American countries.

At the very time that these tariff beneficiaries are sympathizing with the possible loss of tax revenue in Latin America, our oil-producing States have been suffering from loss of such revenue derived from the petroleum industry. Venezuela is not the only nation in which petroleum products furnish a principal source of taxation. Many of our Western States have made this the major element in their budget. The prostration of this industry is causing these States to propose greatly increased ad valorem taxes in the attempt to adjust budgets upset by failure in the expected returns of gross production taxes on petroleum. For instance, Texas imposes a rate of 2 cents on the gross petroleum production. For the fiscal year ending September 30, 1927, it received from such a tax $5,656,664.49. In the fiscal year ending September 30, 1931, it received only $3,346,145.50, in spite of the output of the new east Texas field. Oklahoma, imposing 3 per cent gross production tax, received $12,102,426.28 in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1927, and only $6,566,006.96 in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1931. In the last half of 1931 Oklahoma received only $1,854,766.02. Arkansas received, in 1927, $1,237,007.79, which dropped in 1931 to $204,406.73.

While this gentleman is bewailing the possible hard luck which may fall upon the tax collector in Venezuela many of the sovereign States of this Nation are in serious financial difficulties because American money is going into Venezuela paying for Venezuelan products produced by Venezuelan labor and sold in American markets to the demoralization of an American industry and to the ruin of American labor.

It is no wonder that as was stated in behalf of labor organizations of the country, representing five and a half million members, practically all of whom were said, at the hearing before the House Ways and Means Committee, to be citizens and voters, the unpatriotic attitude taken by tariff beneficiaries who oppose the oil tariff is being capitalized by anti-American interests. Mr. Harvey C. Fremming, international president of the Oil Field Gas Well and Refining Workers of America, in which the following, officially representing the organizations named, joined: Edward J. McGrady, legislative representative, American Federation of Labor; M. J. Flynn, America's Wage Earners Protective Conference; D. C. Cone, Brotherhood of Signalmen; A. S. Stout, Brotherhood of Maintenance of Way; A. J. Lovell, Brotherhood of Firemen and Enginemen; George Laughlin, Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers; W. D. Johnson, Order of Railroad Conductors; J. A. Farquharson, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, made this statement:

American patriotism is silenced in many of the oil-producing communities where workers are listening with active interest to the doctrines of Bolshevism and communism, while clever and unscrupulous agitators emphasize to them the iniquities of an economic system which dooms to starvation armies of American workers while a few great oil-importing concerns or their subsidiaries are paying hundreds of millions of dollars yearly in dividends, whose rates sometimes reach as high as 400 per cent per year. These men are faced by a condition which no arguments can minimize. They know that their communities would be prosperous, that they would be earning American wages, maintaining their families under normal American standards, if the industry in which they labor was not utterly demoralized by the imported products of cheap labor to the fabulous enrichment of a few wealthy corporations.

There is still another angle to this question of Americanism and patriotism as contrasted to the greed of those who ignore any responsibility to the people of this country. This point was also brought out by Mr. Fremming, who, speaking for labor, told the House Committee on Ways and Means of the attempt made to capitalize the love of America and concern for American prosperity by the very forces which were promoting foreign production and employing foreign labor to the ruin of American industry. Mr. Fremming said:

Every nation in the world is urging consumption of home products. Practically every nation is requiring that foreign products shall be labeled so that patriotic consumers may discriminate. For an illustration, American capital has large interests in Czechoslovakia. Under the theory advanced by the pleader for the oil importers that capital has the prior right to American markets. Actually, however, when we buy any Czechoslovakian product, whether it be jewelry, textiles, shoes, or other commodities, we find upon that product in clear, legible letters the legend "Made in Czechoslovakia." The same rule applies to Germany, France, Japan, and many other countries. When the consumer of gasoline or other products of petroleum makes his purchase there is no way in which he can favor the American product against its foreign competitor. Sometimes he makes ludicrous errors. For instance, the autoist may drive into a station and find the name of the American Oil Co., which has a ringing, patriotic sound. He may fill his tank with Amoco, the well-known popular brand of gasoline, under the impression that he is patronizing home industries and purchasing a product produced by American labor. That may be his intention. What he is actually doing is purchasing a South American product, produced by cheap South American labor, whose importation has had a destructive effect upon American labor and American industry and which, if one were enabled to pursue the economic effects to their ultimate end, has decreased his own earning power and purchasing power alike, while it has only enriched an oil-importing corporation.

In the current number of the Saturday Evening Post, dated February 20, put on sale before that date, there is an article by Dorothy Thompson, in which is set forth the movement in other countries of the world for protection of their own home industries and the development of the sense of nationalism. Miss Thompson writes:

The pendulum swings back. The slogans of the moment are: Buy British; invest British. Buy German; invest German. Buy French; invest French. Back to the home soil and up with the fences, powerful though invisible. * * *

On the political side the movement means, of course, a tendency away from the parties which have political links with other countries—even away from those which preach free trade. Hence, in England, the Labor Party was defeated catastrophically at the polls in October. * * *

It is a generally accepted policy of all parties in England that "you can't let the people starve." The issue is not whether there shall be public bread for the unemployed but whether there shall be margarine as well, and in what quantities both shall be provided. The defeat of labor was instinctive rather than rational, and it came about through the realization that Great Britain was in a serious crisis and through the fear that the Labor Party was considering the world first and Britain second, rather than the other way around. Down to defeat with labor goes free-trade liberalism.

Miss Tompson continues:

The tendency toward nationalistic revival has been developing generally since 1928, accelerated by the world crisis. But not until 1931 did this zenophobia—this gray-squirrel complex—express itself fully in economic life.

The outstanding characteristic of Europe's economic life to-day is the movement everywhere, from England to Turkey, toward what the Germans call Autarkie—the constituting of self-sufficient bodies, where possible, inside the geographic boundaries of the national unit, or inside a complex of associated states—which try to the greatest possible extent to be the consumers only of their own commodities, while exporting the surplus or exchanging it by barter.

In England, Germany, France, and all the smaller nations, including those where economic self-sufficiency appears entirely out of the question, such as Hungary, all the forces of organized publicity are being brought to bear upon the populations to favor the goods produced at home at the expense of imports, and the publicity campaign is supported by tariffs, prohibition of imports, and measures to restrain the flight of capital, all of which together work to make the buying of foreign goods difficult, if not impossible.

In England, department stores display goods conspicuously marked British or Empire made, and such imports as are for sale are marked foreign. Gordon Selfridge has stated that the campaign has been successful and that increasing numbers of buyers are demanding home products and refusing everything else. The press screams about dumping, and to read the papers one would think that the importation of butter and other food products into Britain is criminal, although some one has estimated that if England were to supply her own dairy products she would need to have three cows for every acre of the British Isles.

One might quote at still greater length from this carefully written article showing the development of this sense of nationalism in nation after nation. Enough has been cited, however, to show what is the present tendency throughout the world. We are the notable exception. We are promoting, apparently, foreign interests at the cost of American prosperity and welfare.

Is it not time for a rebirth of American patriotism? Do we have responsibilities for our own citizens? Are American markets to be made available for all the world except our own people? Are American dollars to be paid anybody and everybody except American workers? Are we to pay the debts of all the world while denying to our own nationals the opportunity to earn wages with which to meet their own obligations? Are we to ignore George Washington's classic warning against foreign entanglements, or are we to throw to the winds every lesson which history has ever taught us and wreck the welfare of our people to the enrichment of a few and the impoverishment of the multitude? I have just received a letter whose very superscription as well as the letter itself indicates the spontaneous character of the message it contains. It was addressed to "Mr. Wirt Franklin, in charge of committee working for tariff on oil, Washington, D. C." The Post Office Department had difficulty in finding this gentleman. The postal stamp upon the envelope read "Not in Directory." Another "Not United States Senate." A third "Try Senate Commerce." In some way the post office did locate Mr. Franklin and delivered it. It contained the following missive, in which I have omitted nothing except the name of the stock mentioned by the writer. It is sufficient to say that this stock is not one of the great oil importing corporations who are paying 400 per cent dividends and distributing a quarter of a billion dollars annually to their stockholders.

WINSTON-SALEM, N. C., February 5, 1932.

Mr. WIRT FRANKLIN,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. FRANKLIN: Not only in every city but in every town and much of the rural country, there are holders of oil-stock investors, for nearly every family uses gas and they feel that by buying oil stock they get back a part of the amount spent for gas.

Take my case—I am a man of no wealth, but there are four children that have all finished college during the last few years, and went to work at small salaries. Two of them teaching, and you know the kind of salaries paid for that.

Well, I advised them to buy through Morris plan bank, paying every cent each month that they could spare, and the stock kept coming down, and they kept hunting indorsers for their notes, so that they could buy a few more shares to average down the total cost, but it kept coming down until to-day they are paying on notes with collateral worth less than the balance due.

The stock is worth $35 per share and selling at $4.50. Not on account of the stock, but on account of the company's earnings. Now, my point in writing to you is this: If you succeed in getting a tariff on oil immediately the oil companies will begin to show a reasonable profit on their investment, which will reflect in a higher market for their securities, and even if the oil stocks only go to one-half their book value, it would in many instances be three to four times the amount at which they are now selling; which, in turn, would mean that you could take the stock to the bank for a loan for twice the amount that you would get if you sold them outright at present prices, and you could take that money and buy a new "auto" or start a new home, or in some way put the money to work to help business again to "hum."

Figure for yourself the amount of money that would start moving in the business world if oil stocks were selling at book values and everyone could borrow on that basis half their value and put the money into circulation buying homes, furniture, automobiles, farms, etc. If you can use either this idea or this letter to any advantage do so.

Yours very truly,

JAMES B. STEPHENSON.

P. S.—I will make oath that this letter was neither requested nor suggested, and that neither you nor anyone else interested in an oil tariff know that any such person as J. P. Stephenson existed.

The proper protection of the American petroleum industry concerns the common people of this Nation. It involves directly the well-being of over 20,000,000 people in the oil-producing States west of the Mississippi. Indirectly, it also involves the prosperity of the very ones who are opposed to this bill, the tariff-protected industries of New England. In spite of their misconception, the market of one-fifth of the American people is worth more to our American manufacturers than all of Latin America. When we restore the market in the oil-producing States we will hasten the restoration of the prosperity and employment in New England. This measure involves the well-being of our merchant marine, which would be used in transportation of American oil produced by American labor to American ports, for consumption by American factories where American workers labor. It would involve the welfare of our railroads who miss the great freight movements of the manufactured goods of our industrial States carried westward to the vanishing markets of the oil States of the Union. It would aid the farmer. In fact, it is difficult to see who would not be benefited by this return to American principles, to the protection of an essential American industry, the third in importance of the Nation, with the sole exception of a handful of great oil importing corporations who are profiting now through the ruin of millions of American people.

Surely America has some rights. If we are going to be true to the fundamental principles for which this Government was established, the promotion of the general welfare of the people, we must recognize its rights; and, while we may look with friendliness and sympathy upon the misfortunes of the rest of the world and do all that is legitimate to remedy the evils of other nations, we must first put our own house in order and care for our own people and promote our own industries. I know no better method by which all of this may be accomplished than through reviving the distressed petroleum industry of the United States by protecting its rights in the American market.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. BUSBY].

Mr. BUSBY. Mr. Chairman, it had been the hope of a number of gentlemen who are interested in what we believe is a subject that would be far-reaching as a remedy for our present financial situation to have some extended discussion on the floor of this House. I want to frankly say that I do not understand the method of management of time and speaking that has been inaugurated and put into effect for the last several weeks.

General debate, at all times on appropriation bills where you apply to a member of the committee and are controlled absolutely in the amount of time that you are given, not by the House but by some member of the committee, is not always satisfactory. It is not satisfactory for the simple reason that we have come to believe that speeches made by permission and in time extended by the chairman from some committee are made for home consumption, and as a result the membership of the House is conspicuously absent because they have no knowledge of what subjects will be discussed, and they have no knowledge as to what Members may go on the floor to take part in the discussion.

I do not know that anybody additional would be present if it had been announced 10 days ago that I was going to speak on the floor of the House, but at least it would have given some of you who are present an opportunity to have purposely absented yourselves, and I think you ought to have had that opportunity. [Laughter.]

There seems to be a policy under the present management of time that nobody shall speak by permission of the House but rather by permission of the chairman of some committee. I do not like this. I am not one of the managers though. I do think, Mr. Chairman, if we can not have some say in the type of legislation to be brought before the House for consideration, we are at least entitled to the floor of the House to discuss the ideas that, according to our notions, should go into legislation. We are entitled to speak for the people in our several districts, and if we can not speak on the bill, we can speak on the floor of the House and let the country know our attitude with regard to pending legislation or legislation that should be proposed.

We have passed the reconstruction finance act which provides $2,000,000,000 to be loaned under the provisions of that act.

We have passed in the House the Glass-Steagall bill, that is to broaden the basis for our currency, and we might term it an emergency currency bill.

One of these bills provides for $2,000,000,000, and perhaps the other will make four or five billion dollars of paper eligible for loans by the Federal reserve banks not now eligible.

But they do not strike at the right point, for the reason that extending credit to a man already in debt puts him further in debt.

I do not know whether you have stopped to consider the subject, but all the financial legislation that has been enacted in this country has been legislation to provide credit. There seems to be a notion that if a man owes a thousand dollars, and you extend him credit for another thousand dollars on property he has and enable him to owe $2,000, somehow or other he will be able to pay both thousand dollars, when you do not provide any plan or scheme for him to do it.

The Constitution says that "Congress shall have the power to coin money" and "regulate the value thereof."

The framers of the Constitution had in mind that Congress should "regulate" the value of money in relation to what? What things in business and trade have true value? The Bureau of Labor Statistics determines every week in the year the value of the 784 commodities used in commerce in this country. These commodities possess true values. The wholesale commodity index price is the center of gravity in the commerce of the country. Should not we relate our determination to that when we fix the value of the currency?

Look at the ridiculous situation. You wheat growers are getting 50 cents a bushel for wheat. A short time ago your wheat was worth $2 a bushel. You can not pay your debts, because Congress has not regulated the value of money in relation to the true values, which are the commodities that are consumable and which we strive to obtain.

Now, I have not much time to discuss this, but there has been no program put forward by the President or the leaders in either House of Congress proposing anything to bring relief to the millions of people who are laboring to produce commodities or manufacture goods. When they produce them they can get nothing for them comparable to the obligations incurred. It is not going to do any good for the man who owes a thousand dollars to lend him a thousand dollars more and get him further into debt.

What we need is the stabilization of the purchasing power of money.

When the Secretary of the Treasury was before us a few days ago I asked him if he had any plan or suggestion that if put into effect would relieve the people and give them hope to escape these cycles of depression hereafter. He said, "I suppose I would be the greatest man in the world if I had some plan to offer that would save the people from being wiped out in property holdings every 10 or 12 years," or words practically to that effect.

Why, the credit machinery of this country, the Federal reserve banks, and our Federal-created credit institutions are turned over to the professional bankers. The professional bankers are not men looking at the economics involved; they do not care much about the common mass of the people. They are looking for the credit investors, men who can buy credit accommodations and pay well for the accommodation extended to them.

What are the leaders handling the legislation at the present time proposing to bring relief to the farmers and the people back in the communities?

Not one thing, except these palliatives which propose to further involve the national credit and make a charge against it, and then make an appropriation of public funds to salve over the situation. Our present financial trouble is like having your yardstick 3 feet at the present time and 12 or 15 feet two or three years from now. That is a good illustration of the situation. If you were a merchant, under such conditions you could not stay in business very long. If you have debts to pay, contracted at a time when commodities were four times the price of what they are now, you could not pay them. That is the situation all over the country. We are told that there are 8,300,000 who are jobless, that 12,000,000 people need help and assistance to-day, and that there are 40,000,000 people in the country who are living below the normal scale of living, so much so that their health is endangered. All of these things we are doing here to provide funds for the relief of banks, railroads, insurance companies are not putting any earning power into the masses of the people who are destitute, in want, losing their homes, losing their farms, and all of their other commodities, who are being turned out into the world with nothing. Legislation we are enacting is not reaching them. You ask me how we could reach them. I would simply put into law the plan that Professor Fisher, Mr. Babson, Vice President Marshall, and others have recommended to this country, to make the dollar the servant of trade instead of the master of the people. The gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH] had some correspondence with Mr. Roger W. Babson, some 10 years ago, and I want to read to you what he said about the type of legislation that we are advocating to stabilize the buying power of the dollar. But before I do that let me ask whether you gentlemen realize what is in the way of our enacting this legislation into law? The reason is that Members of Congress do not understand the proposals. They do not give time to the study of it so that they will understand it. The next thing is that this is a presidential election year, and nobody who is responsible politically, who is looking for some preferment, possibly in the next election, is willing to step out and advocate any sort of sound monetary reform, because the bankers of the country might ridicule him and call his legislative proposals unsound. That is my opinion and conviction about one trouble we face. The bankers are a great crowd. They ridicule everything that is not in their favor, nonsensical ridicule it is true, and consequently Congress comes along and says that it is dangerous to tamper with the money question. We do not put sufficient time to the study of money reform proposals. How many of us have studied the proposals that Professor Fisher has made? How many have studied the proposals that we are asking to have enacted into law? We must study them or we will not understand them.

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BUSBY. Yes.

Mr. GARBER. I assume, and I think I am perfectly justified in doing it, that there is not any question but that the membership of this House is in favor of a stabilized currency, a stabilized dollar. If the gentleman can show us concretely in a legislative form how we can accomplish that, I am satisfied the gentleman will present a piece of legislation that will receive the favorable report and approval of this House and the other body.

Mr. BUSBY. I thank you. I am glad to have that interruption, because we have sought to have hearings begin before the Banking and Currency Committee of the House on the 29th of this month. What I am saying here to-day is not in criticism of the House of Representatives or anyone else, but to arouse some interest in the subject, so that we will realize its importance enough for us to put our time and attention to it, in order to study it and try to solve it, because it is a very unsatisfactory condition for us to recur to every 10 or 12 years. Most of the people are financially wiped out periodically, and there is no remedy that has been offered for that. I am glad to have the interruption from the gentleman. I feel he is speaking the true sentiment of the House, that every individual in the House wants to do something to remedy permanently the distressing situation in which we are now engulfed. I read now from the letter of Mr. Roger W. Babson to the gentleman from Maryland, Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, written 10 years ago:

> If you do not succeed in your first attempt I hope you will keep everlastingly at it. Depend upon it, some day the dollar will be stabilized.
>
> It is the growing consciousness of the need of stabilization which has led not only to Professor Fisher's plan, which your bill embodies, but to the less-worked-out plans of Edison, Ford, Senator Ladd, etc.
> Business men and bankers have expressed alarm over some of these proposals on the ground that they may produce inflation. Any proposal the effect of which would be inflationistic ought to be nipped in the bud. What we want is something to prevent both, and that is the object and effect of the bill which you have introduced. The common idea that we must, on principle, oppose any plan to change our currency system is simply sitting on the safety valve. If something is not done to give us a scientific and stable currency some unscientific and unstable currency will be enacted. The only way to head off further instability is to make greater stability. The conservative man who is afraid of a change ought to support your bill, because our present system changes our monetary standard every year. This constant change in the purchasing power of our dollar is the greatest foe of conservative business. It makes a speculation of everything. For years I have been studying the business cycle and trying to help the business man, by foresight, to struggle through the cycle. But I have repeatedly said in my speeches and writings on this subject that until we had the Fisher plan or some equivalent for stabilizing the dollar the business man would always be suffering from the business cycle. I could give instance after instance of the evils which come from a changing yardstick in commerce.

As ex-Vice President Marshall has said, next to the peace problem, the problem of stabilizing the dollar is of the next greatest importance.

I have studied Professor Fisher's plan from time to time with great care, and the objections which have been alleged against it. As I have often said, only those who do not understand it oppose it.

Let me add that my audiences of business men all over the country, when they have had the idea explained to them, like it immensely.

The Congress which stabilizes the dollar will deserve and receive the everlasting gratitude of the business world.

Why are we sold on this myth that gold, managed by international-banking organizations that fix international-exchange rates and manipulate it, is the thing we must depend on to measure commodity values in exchange between neighbor and neighbor? It is not necessary. The only thing we have to do is to wake up and study the system we have—then remedy it.

Is the system we are working under now satisfactory to you? Are you satisfied with the way farm-commodity prices fluctuate? By the way, farm commodities are always more or less perishable and vary greatly in their up and down swing—more so than other commodities. Are you satisfied with the manner in which they have been varying in the last year or two? If not, what are you trying to do to serve your people to remedy the conditions? Are you leaving it to me? No; you are not leaving it to me. Are you leaving it to some other Member? No; I happen to be a member of a committee that is studying the question. I am so aroused by the destitute condition to which our people have been swept by this unscientific and undependable system that I am willing to go to any length in studying the situation to try to evolve and adopt some plan that will save us.

We talk about farm relief. If we will stabilize the purchasing power of the dollar we will have farm relief, because the dollar and your commodities will stand on a parity with each other, and we will not find it necessary to sell 2 bushels of wheat to get $1; in other words, four times as much wheat to get a dollar as we did five years ago. We talk about saving the country banks. If we will stabilize the purchasing power of the dollar the country banks will be made safe, because a bank can not fail until the commodities on which the bank has security shall fail, whether it be land or wheat or whatever it is. As long as the price remains reasonably stable the banks will have value back of the paper which they hold. That is the place to start to give farm relief and to stabilize the condition of the country banks. No bank ever failed unless it was unfaithfully managed, until the community around it failed.

I simply want to ask you to join in this matter in an interested way to help us work out a solution. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I wish to express appreciation to the gentleman from Mississippi for myself, and I feel I can properly say for the membership of the House, for the very thoughtful, informing, and constructive address he has made. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from New York, Mr. BLACK.

Mr. BLACK. Mr. Chairman, the memory of Lincoln was a victim of the depression. This great American was tumbled from his pedestal by Cabinet officials. The highest compliment they granted him on his birthday was that he was almost as great as Hoover. The main difference between Lincoln and Hoover is that in Hoover's day the people are the martyrs. Had Hoover been in Lincoln's place the slaves would still be waiting for a commission to report on their freedom, the Emancipation Proclamation would be just around the corner, and the Union would be on the toboggan. We had to wait for Hoover, the engineer, to make the Nation go down hill faster than a bobsled.

Hoover's mutual-admiration Cabinet bewails criticism of Hoover as abuse. The two most-abused public men in our history were Abe Lincoln and Al Smith—and Hoover's supporters threw the dirt at Smith with no word of restraint from the chief. They did not even spare Smith's family. Nobody has ever abused Hoover's official family. It is too funny to be abused.

Yet the Cabinet conducted Hoover memorial services on Lincoln's birthday. It was a magnificent tribute to the politically dead.

They told us that Hoover was like Lincoln. Imagine Hoover tolerating a general who violated the noble experiment like Grant. Imagine Lincoln watching a nation starve and yelling, "Three cheers for Lincoln." As usual the Cabinet was wrong. Hoover is no more like Lincoln than a rolling stone is like the Rock of Gibraltar.

Next Monday the Cabinet officials will turn the tide and tell us Hoover is just like Washington. Imagine Hoover and the Wickersham Commission crossing the Delaware without rocking the boat. Imagine Hoover telling the truth about cutting down the cherry tree of prosperity with his little hatchet of optimism. Imagine Hoover at Valley Forge cheering up the boys with a few pamphlets of the Anti-Saloon League.

We beg of the Cabinet to please lay off George Washington. Do not spoil the entire idealization work of the Bicentennial Commission by saying Hoover is like Washington. They desecrated Lincoln's birthday by their Hoover eulogies. But, after all, Lincoln started the Republican Party and Hoover ended it. Washington always fought the Tories.

We Democrats feel sort of charitable toward Hoover, but we still venerate Washington and Lincoln. We are willing to have his medicine-ball Cabinet toss the Hoover taurus over the land, for we soon will have the White House. The only danger to our party is that he has been so well trusted by our own leaders he might decide to become a Democrat again.

We Democrats do not mind the Cabinet members chanting the praises of their dear departed, but we wish they would not waste the national holidays. They should set aside a certain day for this purpose, say, April 1. [Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. COCHRAN].

Mr. COCHRAN of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, I notice that the subcommittee considering the Agriculture Department appropriation bill in the Senate has stricken from that bill two provisions inserted by the House that sought to bring about a reduction in personnel and likewise a reduction in the amount of money that is spent for personnel in the Government. My friend the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA], who has the courage of his convictions, a most conscientious official and valuable Member of this House, opposed those items when they were before the House. I did not agree with the gentleman then, nor do I agree with the gentleman now. When that item was inserted in the bill some officials who represented the Federal employees' unions and associations came to me and requested that I oppose the proposal. I declined to do so, and I told them that the Committee on Appropriations in the House of Representatives had found a way to cut down Government expenditures without reducing the salaries of Government employees.

There are several thousand Government employees in my city—St. Louis—and, as far as I know, they are perfectly willing to accept these provisos. I rise here to-day to say to the Government employees that if they do not stop their representatives in Washington who oppose every effort to reduce expenditures on the personnel they are aiding those who seek to reduce the salaries of Government employees. [Applause.] I am opposed to reducing the salaries of Government employees who are receiving barely a living wage, but I am in favor of reducing the number of Government employees, and I am, until this country is on a more sound footing, in favor of refusing to grant any promotions which mean increases in salaries. [Applause.]

The first bill to be considered was the Department of Agriculture appropriation bill. What are the official duties of the Secretary of Agriculture? He is charged with the work of promoting agriculture in its broadest sense. That department has promoted agriculture and has stimulated production to such an extent that the commodities that the farmers now produce are produced in such great quantity that they can not receive a price which equals the cost of production. If there is any one Government agency that can stand a reduction at this time, in my opinion, it is the Department of Agriculture; and yet its representatives went before the Senate committee and opposed the House provision. I want to say I think it is time the President of the United States makes his official family come to time and quit opposing his efforts and the efforts of the House of Representatives to reduce appropriations. [Applause.]

The Secretary of Agriculture as well as the officials of the Farm Board have been going around the country for over a year urging that the producer reduce his yield. Lower production is their cry. Still the Congress appropriates $75,000,000 for the Department of Agriculture, whose duties are to stimulate production. Is this good business? Would it not have been far better to make some direct appropriations to help the millions of farmers who are in such dire need of assistance rather than to spend this amount of money at a time when the Secretary of Agriculture is going around the country at Government expense telling the farmers to reduce their acreage?

I wonder how the President will feel when he learns that representatives of the Department of Agriculture oppose reductions in expenditures when he is asking for reductions right along the line.

The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WOOD] said to-day the President wants reductions. Then I say to Mr. WOOD to tell the President to pull his subordinates off. Tell them to remain away from Congress when the Congress is trying to reduce Government expenditures. The Congress wants cooperation, not opposition, from the executive branch of the Government and those in authority should see that we get it.

We have arrived at the point where we must say no. I receive hundreds of letters asking me to hold down expenditures, then when the pet of some citizens suffers a reduction, especially where the activity has an outside organization, we are flooded with letters and telegrams urging us to refrain from crippling that activity. I have a habit of saying no when no should be said, and in every instance I am saying no. I propose to stand by the Committee on Appropriations of the House, which is reducing appropriations below the recommendations of the Bureau of the Budget, and if I can find any items that I think should be further reduced I am going to urge that such action be taken. What arouses me is that those who should be assisting us are throwing obstacles in our way.

The one way to effect a cure is to further reduce the appropriation when the Government official complains. If you will do that a few times it will not be long before they will stay away. A dose of such medicine will be very effective. I know of a Federal judge who always increased the sentence when some official sought to influence him in criminal cases. You can bet they never visit that judge any more. He let it be known that he would follow that procedure, and appeals for clemency never reach his ears now. Mr. Chairman, in conclusion I say again to the Federal employees of this country that they had better accept what the House has tried to do to reduce the personnel and expenditures affecting the personnel because if they do not they will find bills affecting their salaries being considered on the floor of both Houses. So far as those in the high brackets are concerned, who can stand a reduction, they will probably suffer before Congress adjourns, but I am addressing myself now to those in the lower brackets who are in control of the Federal organizations. Notify your representatives in Washington to cease opposing the efforts of those who are trying to save the underpaid employee from a reduction. They are doing you no good—they are doing you harm. The Government expenditures must be reduced. The taxpayers of the country demand it and they have a right to demand it. [Applause.]

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOLADAY].

Mr. HOLADAY. Mr. Chairman, in line with what has been said by the gentleman from Missouri, who has just preceded me, with reference to curtailing the expenses of our Government, I introduced this morning a resolution which, in my opinion, will be effective for that purpose, and as far as I know it is the only method that has been proposed that will be effective.

We all know that when a committee of Congress, working piecemeal, undertakes to abolish or to cut down any particular department or bureau there is opposition to that reduction. Under the resolution which I have introduced Congress gives to the President blanket and absolute power—to be exercised within the period of one year—to abolish, to consolidate, and to combine any commission, board, department, bureau, or division. There is only one restriction upon that power, and that is after the President, by Executive order, has abolished, combined, or consolidated one or more departments, he show as a result of that consolidation that there has been a saving of 20 per cent in the personnel and a saving of 20 per cent in the gross pay roll of all those departments that have been consolidated.

If there is a real intention and desire on the part of the Congress to reduce the cost of government, this is the way that purpose can be accomplished. Congress gives to the President the absolute power; it is passed to him; he is responsible; he can make savings wherever he thinks they can be made and the savings must be made, because when he reports the result of his combinations or consolidations to Congress he must show that there has been a reduction of 20 per cent in the personnel and 20 per cent in the gross pay roll of those departments that have been consolidated. If there is any question as to whether or not 20 per cent is the proper amount, the committee, after mature deliberation, can raise or lower it. But if this House and the party in power and responsible for action in this House really wants to effect any economy in government, there is the way to do it—granting that power and that absolute authority to the President with but one restriction, and that is a restriction that will effect a saving to the taxpayers of this country.

I hope the chairman of the committee to which this resolution was referred will give the resolution early and careful consideration.

I thank you, and yield back the balance of my time.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. HOGG].

Mr. HOGG of West Virginia. Mr. Chairman, every measure which has been considered by the present Congress has dealt primarily with the question of relief. Not only has this idea been foremost in measures dealing with finances but in the consideration of every revenue measure not only in the Appropriations Committee but upon the floor of the House. The underlying motive has been constructive. The Members of the House may differ in the matter of party principles, but partisanship in this session has not yet made its appearance when the question of national relief has been involved.

The number of bills introduced during the present session of Congress dealing with finances is staggering. The measures which have been referred to the Committee on Banking and Currency are multitudinous. Practically every Member has some contribution to make with reference to relieving the country from the present depression which no one seeks to ignore and, incidentally, it is of little consolation to know that this condition is world-wide.

Much of the legislation of past Congresses has been of a type which reflected sectionalism. In past years there has been evidence of an industrial East and agricultural West, each with its corresponding problems but making entirely different demands as to needs of legislation. With such a condition it was difficult for one to appreciate the problems of the other; but with the great national problems which we are facing to-day, the situation is entirely different. For the same identical industrial paralysis has seized every section of the country through our financial system. The riot of failures and bankruptcy has run its course in the most remote sections of the United States. Big banks, little banks, savings banks, banks of deposit, building and loan associations, and every conceivable kind of financial institution has been wrecked within the past few months. Indiscriminately, without respect to persons or locality, the collapse of these financial institutions has raged—the power apparently in no one to check its mad course.

In light of this situation, therefore, the present Congress assembled to deal with a problem that was not sectional and certainly, therefore, not political. The cry for aid was country-wide and uniform and for the first time since the World War the Congress of the United States approached the solution of a problem which could not be surrounded by a political atmosphere.

The Committee on Banking and Currency of the House has been practically in continuous session since the organization of the House. The membership of that committee is composed of men of ability who are in close touch with both the practical and the theoretical side of banking, and, in addition, the committee numbers among its members some able lawyers of the country. They have given careful and close consideration to scores of relief measures, and, through their recommendations, there have been enacted many relief measures. Under these circumstances the suggestions which I shall make to-day are intended in no manner to reflect upon the judgment of this committee but rather for the purpose of bringing to their attention certain classes of financial institutions which are now excluded from benefiting by the relief measures which the House has heretofore passed.

I am especially interested in the feature of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act dealing with insolvent institutions. The plain purpose of the act among other things is to aid banking institutions—both solvent and insolvent. Nor is this relief, so far as the wording of the act is concerned, restricted in such a manner as to prefer national banks to State banks or banking institutions. So far as the national banking act is concerned there is only one type of institution considered, and that is a national bank under jurisdiction of the Comptroller of the Currency. Practically since the passage of the original national bank act, the operation of a national bank has been restricted to a commercial banking business, and it was not until within a comparatively recent time that Federal legislation enabled the national banks of the country to enter into a trust business. At the present time all national-banking associations are restricted to the business of commercial banking, with incidental trust powers. The draft of a relief measure, therefore, so far as national banks are concerned, is not as complicated as where an attempt is made to make the same provisions of relief applicable generally to financial institutions organized under the laws of the State. While the national banking act contemplates only national banks with trust powers, such is not the case with reference to State banking acts. In this latter field we find commercial banks, savings banks, credit unions, trust companies, building and loan associations, and countless other institutions of a similar nature.

The Reconstruction Finance Corporation act makes equal and uniform provision for all of these various classes of institutions, whether State or National, only so long as they are solvent. As I pointed out to the Members of the House on January 15, 1932, when the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill was then under consideration, when these same institutions become insolvent there is an unjust discrimination against the State institutions. I specifically refer to section 5, which authorizes the loans "to any bank, savings bank, trust company, building and loan association, including loans secured by the assets of any bank that is closed." The point I wish again to make is that loans can be made to any bank, savings bank, trust company, or building and loan association that is solvent, but when insolvency occurs loans can only be made to banks. The practical application of this measure is to grant relief for the benefit of a creditor or a commercial bank, but to deny this same relief to a man who may have his life earnings tied up in an insolvent trust company, savings bank, or building and loan association.

Under the laws of practically all of the States, especially the State of West Virginia, savings banks, building and loan associations, and trust companies are banking institutions with the exception that they do not enter the commercial field. Trust companies, savings banks, and building and loan associations, in actual practice, do receive deposits and issue certificates and other forms of obligations therefor to the same extent as commercial banks. In the vast majority of the States all these institutions come under the same banking laws and are subject to the same supervision as commercial banks. Under these circumstances it seems to me that it is quite discriminatory for Congress to extend aid to an insolvent commercial bank then deny the same relief to savings banks, trust companies, and building and loan associations.

While the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act does not expressly so state, yet the underlying purpose of the entire measure is to liquefy frozen assets; but when relief is extended to insolvent commercial banks and then withheld from insolvent savings banks, trust companies, and building and loan associations, the very purpose of the measure itself is defeated. Of all these four classes of banking institutions, only the assets of a commercial bank have any semblance of liquidity.

These other three institutions—the savings bank, trust company, and building and loan association—by their very natures deal only in frozen assets, and their assets become frozen the very day they begin business. The importance of these various State banking institutions can not be exaggerated. In the report of the Comptroller of the Currency for the year 1931 there were 600 mutual savings banks in the United States and over 12,000,000 depositors, whose total savings amounted to more than $10,000,000,000. There were 654 stock savings banks with almost 2,000,000 depositors, with deposits amounting to over a billion dollars. For the same year there were 1,469 trust companies in operation in the United States, with aggregate deposits of more than $12,000,000,000.

As stressing the importance of aiding insolvent building and loan associations, I wish to call attention to the fact that during the year 1930, 190 of these organizations failed, with an estimated loss of over $24,000,000. The people who are vitally interested in this type of financial institution are those who can least afford to lose. The number of creditors of these institutions is extremely large, and their obligations in many instances represent life savings. It will be quite difficult to explain just why this Congress would accord to a depositor in a commercial bank, with a casual checking account, greater consideration than to a man whose life savings are involved. It is my earnest hope, therefore, that Congress will see fit to amend the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act to bring relief to all classes of banking institutions—State and national, solvent and insolvent—with the sole purpose of reaching every individual whose resources are tightly impounded in these insolvent financial institutions of the State, and not to deny this relief merely because he has chosen as the depository of his funds some institution which does not happen to be specifically named in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOGG of West Virginia. For a question; yes.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. The President did not recommend it in that particular bill.

Mr. HOGG of West Virginia. So far as the insolvent State banks are concerned, they are precluded from relief under the actual application of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act. This result is not by design or intent upon the part of Congress, because, as I pointed out to the House on February 10, the whole purpose of the act, as disclosed by the committee hearings as well as the debates on the floor of the House, was to make no distinction between national and State banks. Nor does this discrimination exist by reason of any affirmative action on the part of Congress, but rather arises through technicalities which exist where there is attempted cooperation between the State and National Governments. By way of a specific illustration of the operation of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act, in so far as it extends relief to insolvent State institutions, the directors of the Finance Corporation will quite naturally advise the receiver of an insolvent State bank there will be advanced a certain specific sum upon the execution by the receiver of a note secured by pledging the assets of the insolvent institution. All of this is in accord with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act. The difficulty, however, is encountered when the receiver attempts to comply with the demands of the Finance Corporation. When he goes to execute the note required he finds that he has no such authority under the laws of his State. Further, he is powerless in the matter of pledging any of the assets of his institution. He is only authorized to sell, and the Reconstruction Finance Corporation is not authorized to buy. Restriction of the powers of the receiver, by reason of the State statutes, prevents his bringing to the creditors of his insolvent institution the aid which is contemplated by Congress.

This unfortunate situation exists in practically every State in the Union; and, since my observations upon this question on February 10, I have obtained extracts from the statutes of all the States with the exception of Maine, and in no instance do I find express authority given the receiver of a State bank to such an extent as to enable him to bring to insolvent State banks the relief which every Member of this House thought would be available when the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill was under debate.

I have here abstracts obtained from the codes of the various States with the exception of Maine, as previously noted, and believe that this information will be of value to other Members. I will not burden you by reading these various abstracts, but will ask unanimous consent that this material be copied into the Journal as a means of ready reference.

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOGG of West Virginia. Yes.

Mr. PATMAN. It will require a change in the State laws in order to remedy that situation, will it not?

Mr. HOGG of West Virginia. I have a solution for it, and I will reach that in a moment.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOGG of West Virginia. For a question; yes.

Mr. COX. Will not the equity power of the court accommodate the needs of the situation?

Mr. HOGG of West Virginia. I have looked into that feature of it and I am convinced they are circumscribed by the absolute statutory laws of the States, so that the receivers can only perform those duties which are expressly authorized by statute.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOGG of West Virginia. Yes.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I believe the bill was not unintentionally drawn to avoid that. I do not charge that to the committee, but I think the underlying motive of it all is to control the State relief of banks and have it absorbed by the particular grants which they desire to put into effect in that section.

Mr. HOGG of West Virginia. I appreciate the gentleman's suggestion.

I am convinced that if the full effect of the relief measures which have been passed by Congress is to be realized, it is highly necessary that arrangements be made for participation by all insolvent State banking institutions that have been recognized as a depository of funds under the supervision of the banking departments of the respective States.

According to the report of the Comptroller of the Currency for the 10½ years ending June 30, 1931, there were a total of 7,672 bank failures, of which number 1,044 were national, and 6,628 State banks.

Mr. KLEBERG. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOGG of West Virginia. Just for a question.

Mr. KLEBERG. The gentleman's report deals with the period up to 1930?

Mr. HOGG of West Virginia. For the year ending October 31, 1931, 1,324 State banks failed, while only 369 national banks failed, representing for that year resources of $1,300,000,000 and $543,800,000 for the insolvent State and insolvent national banks, respectively. These data are advanced for the purpose of showing that relief for insolvent State institutions is even more imperative than aid to national banks because of the far greater number of depositors involved and also by reason of the greater amount of resources impounded. Observations over the period of the past two years show that by far the greater number of these insolvent State banks are those located in smaller communities. The closing of one of these small institutions imposes the greatest conceivable hardship upon every inhabitant. On the other hand, the insolvent national banks are not so generally to be found in these sparsely populated sections of the country. Under no circumstances will anyone deny as urgent need of relief for insolvent State banking institutions as is recognized for insolvent national banks, under the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act.

During the discussion of these various relief measures it has been repeatedly asserted that benefit would be derived from two sources. In the first place, putting $2,000,000,000 of Government funds in the channels of trade will materially affect economic conditions. Secondly, as a forceful means of aid everyone recognizes the psychological effect that this type of legislation will have upon the people of the country. Some of the proponents of these relief measures have very frankly stated that by far the greater benefit to be derived from this program will be psychological. I quite agree with this position, but if the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act is not made to apply with equal uniformity to both State and national institutions the full effect of this psychological aid will be destroyed. Oncef the people of the country are informed that the provisions of the act do not apply to both State and national banks, solvent and insolvent with equal uniformity, and once it is ascertained that the insolvent State banks are not the object of Federal relief a most dangerous distrust will naturally arise toward all these State institutions. During this period of uncertainty and unrest no opportunity must be afforded for any additional hysteria or groundless fears. To my mind, this is one of the most important reasons why every possible precaution should be taken to see that both national and State institutions stand on an equal footing in the application of these relief measures.

To meet these apparent inadequacies of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act, I have introduced to-day a bill designed to accomplish that end. The measure is simple in its terms and easily comprehended. No change is made in any of the wording of the act except where the following clause is added to the limitation found in section 5—

> Nor to any corporation, now organized or which may hereafter be organized under a State statute and engaged in aiding directly or indirectly, through the purchase of assets or otherwise, in the liquidation of State banks, saving banks, trust companies and/or building and loan associations which may have become insolvent and/or suspended from business in accordance with the laws of the State.

Mr. GARBER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOGG of West Virginia. For a question; yes.

Mr. GARBER. This liquidating corporation for each State, which the gentleman suggests, would bridge the gap between the Federal Government and the States; however, it would require State authority, would it not, from the legislatures to create it and authorize it to receive such assistance?

Mr. HOGG of West Virginia. I may say that they doubtless have such authority under the general banking laws of the States and further legislation would not be necessary.

Mr. GARBER. And could receive Federal assistance and pledge assets as security?

Mr. HOGG of West Virginia. The banking statutes of every State give any banking corporation the right to borrow and they can borrow from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation just the same as they could go out on the market and borrow from any other organization that is lending money.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. What would the gentleman do if he wanted to save his State bank and not liquidate it?

Mr. HOGG of West Virginia. As to a State bank that is not in process of liquidation, I may say to the gentleman from New York, I have not dealt with that particular feature of the matter.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman has in mind the liquidating banks.

Mr. HOGG of West Virginia. The liquidation of banks that are now insolvent.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Will the gentleman yield for a brief question?

Mr. HOGG of West Virginia. Yes.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Assuming that the insolvent bank is able to borrow this money from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, is it the purpose of the gentleman's amendment that this bank should then continue to go on and do business?

Mr. HOGG of West Virginia. No; it is not. It is simply an intermediary for effecting the liquidation of these particular institutions.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOGG of West Virginia. Briefly.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. When the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill was before the House for discussion, in the amendment stage, did the gentleman offer an amendment?

Mr. HOGG of West Virginia. I offered that amendment on the floor of the House, reaching these three classes of institutions, but it was not adopted.

The present provisions of the act could be extended to insolvent State banks by legislative enactment, authorizing the receivers of these State institutions to pledge their assets. It must be remembered, however, that the Finance Corporation is authorized to make loans only for the period of one year, and before the various State legislatures could clothe the receivers of their State institutions with authority to pledge the assets this one year period will have expired in many States. The only alternative, therefore, as I pointed out on February 10, is the organization within each State of a liquidating corporation. This liquidating corporation, whose capital stock would be cheerfully subscribed by the solvent banks and those interested in the liquidation of the insolvent ones, could purchase the assets of these insolvent institutions from the receiver. The liquidating corporation in turn would pledge these assets with the Reconstruction Finance Corporation, as is now contemplated under the provisions of the act. Through this way, a very orderly and effective method of the liquidation of these insolvent State institutions could be accomplished.

Let us remember that only $200,000,000, with the expansion thereof, which can not exceed $800,000,000, is available for relief to both solvent and insolvent banks. We must further bear in mind that there are already impounded in the insolvent banking institutions of the country almost two billion dollars, more than one billion, three hundred million of which is in State institutions. It is apparent that there will not be available under the present act, as it now exists, much more than a substantial percentage available to take care of possible demands. If something is not done to aid the insolvent banks, this entire sum will be completely exhausted through demands from national bank sources. To prevent this unfortunate result, therefore, only two courses are open: First, an amendment to the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act, as suggested in my remarks. Second, the speedy consideration of an independent measure dealing exclusively with insolvent State banking institutions. I trust the Members of the House will give serious consideration to these proposals.

Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD an abstract with reference to the laws governing the right of receivers of insolvent institutions and banks, in this particular.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

The matter referred to is as follows:

Alabama (Code 1928, sec. 6307): "The superintendent by making application to the circuit court of the county in which the bank is located, may procure an order to sell or compound all bad or doubtful debts, and on like order may sell all real and personal property of such corporation or individual banker on such terms as the court shall direct. * * *"

Alaska (Laws 1919, ch. 16, p. 44): "* * * The receiver shall, upon the order of the district court, at the request of the Territorial banking board, sell or compound all bad debts or doubtful debts due the bank and sell all other property of such bank. * * *"

Arizona (Revised Code, 1928, sec. 246): "* * * He (the superintendent) shall collect all money and debts due and claims belonging to it, and for such purposes is authorized to bring and defend actions and other proceedings in this State and elsewhere; and upon the order of the superior court of the county in which it is doing business may sell or compound all bad or doubtful debts, and on like order may sell its real and personal property on such terms, at public or private sale, as the court shall direct. * * *"

Arkansas (1927 Sup., Crawford and Moses' Digest, sec. 719, p. 58): "* * * The commissioner shall collect all debts due and claims belonging to it, and for such purposes is authorized to institute, maintain, and defend suits and other proceedings in this State and elsewhere, and upon the order of the chancery court of the county in which it is doing business, may sell or compound all bad or doubtful debts, and on like order may sell all its real and personal property on such terms and at public or private sale as the court shall direct, and if necessary to enforce in this State or elsewhere the liabilities of its stockholders. * * *"

California (1929 Supp., General Laws, sec. 136 p. 2952): "* * * The superintendent of banks may sell any real or personal property of such bank on such terms as the court shall direct or approve. * * *"

Colorado (Compiled Laws 1921, secs. 2729–2730): Sec. 2729. "No receiver shall be appointed for any bank. No bank shall make an assignment for the benefit of creditors. No writ of attachment or execution shall be levied upon the property or assets of any bank when in the possession of the State bank commissioner. No creditors shall maintain any action to recover upon a stockholder's liability while a bank is in the possession of the State bank commissioner but during such time said commissioner shall have the sole and exclusive right to maintain such action."

SEC. 2730. "The State bank commissioner may retain possession of any bank for the purpose of liquidating its affairs. He shall, in such event, have power, and it shall be his duty, to collect all debts, dues, and claims belonging to the bank, and, upon order of the district court of the district wherein such bank is located, based upon a petition of said commissioner setting forth the material facts, and after such notice to at least two general officers of the bank as the court may require, to sell or compound all bad or doubtful debts, and, on like order, to sell all real estate and personal property of the bank, in such manner, for such price, and upon such terms as the court shall direct."

Connecticut (General Statutes 1930, sec. 3922): "* * * They (receivers) shall hold all the assets which come into their hands as such receivers, subject to the order of said court, and shall convert the same into money, with all reasonable dispatch, and for that purpose may sell and dispose of such assets, and make all proper conveyances thereof, and may compromise all doubtful claims for or against such corporation; provided no claim in favor of such corporation against any director, trustee, or other officer thereof, for breach or neglect of official duty, shall be compromised without the special authority and approval of said court * * *."

Delaware (Laws 1921, ch. 103, p. 294): "* * * In a proper case made, the chancellor shall have power to appoint a receiver to take charge of, settle and close up the affairs of such corporation under the direction of the said court. * * *"

Florida (Compiled General Laws, 1927, sec. 6102, p. 1980): "* * * Such receiver, under the direction and supervision of the comptroller, shall take possession of the books, records, and assets of every description of such bank, banker, banking firm, banking and trust company or corporation, and in his name shall sue for and collect all debts, dues, and claims belonging to it, and upon the order of the court of competent jurisdiction may sell or compound all bad or doubtful debts, and on a like order may sell all the real and personal property of such bank, banker, banking firm, banking and trust company, or corporation on such terms as the court shall direct; and may, if necessary to pay the debts of such bank, banker, banking firm, banking and trust company, or corporation, sue for and enforce the individual liability of the stockholders. * * *."

Georgia (Code, 1926, sec. 2366 (52)): "* * * He (the superintendent) may, in the name of the bank, execute and deliver any and all deeds, assignments, bills of sale, transfers, satisfactions, or other instruments necessary or proper to effectuate any sale, lease, or transfer of real or personal property, or to carry into effect any power conferred or duty imposed upon him by this act or by any order of the superior court. * * *."

Hawaii (Revised Laws, 1925, sec. 1275): "* * * The receiver, if any be appointed, shall, under the direction of the court, take possession of the books, records, and assets of every description of such bank, collect all debts, dues, and claims belonging to it and sell or compound all bad or doubtful assets, and sell all the real and personal property of such bank on such terms as the court shall direct, and may, if necessary to pay the debts of such bank, enforce all individual liabilities of stockholders, and shall make a report to the court and bank examiner of all his acts and proceedings. * * *."

Idaho (Compiled Statutes, 1919, sec. 5294): "* * * The department of commerce and industry shall at once proceed to collect all debts, dues, and claims, and to sell or compound all doubtful debts, and to sell all real and personal property on such terms as the court shall direct. Said department shall pay over all money by it received under the order of the court."

Laws 1925, chapter 133, page 220: "* * * He (the commissioner) may institute, in his own name as commissioner or in the name of the bank, such suits and actions and other legal proceedings as he deems expedient for such purposes and, by making application to the district court of the county in which such bank is located or to the judge thereof in chambers, may procure an order to sell, compromise, or compound any bad or doubtful debt or claim and to sell and dispose of any or all the assets, which sale may be made to stockholders, officers, directors, or others interested in such bank on consent of the court. * * *."

Illinois (Laws 1929, p. 180): "* * * Such receiver, under the direction of the auditor, shall take possession of, and for the purpose of the receivership, the title to, the books, records, and assets of every description of such bank and shall proceed to collect all debts, dues, and claims belonging to it, and, upon the order of a court of record of the county in which said bank is located, may sell or compound all bad or doubtful debts, and on a like order may sell all the real and personal property of such bank on such terms as the court shall direct * * *."

Iowa (Laws 1929, ch. 31): "After having made diligent effort to collect or realize on the assets as provided in the preceding section the receiver may sell the remaining assets, in whole or in part, including real estate or any interest therein, and may execute assignments, releases, and satisfactions to effectuate such sales and a receiver may execute assignments, releases, and satisfactions to effectuate sales and transfers made by his predecessors. The superintendent of banking may sell, release, satisfy, or assign any remaining asset, mortgage, or lien of a bank or trust company receivership which has already been terminated. All of the aforesaid sales, assignments, releases, and satisfaction shall be made only on application approved by the court in which the receivership is or was pending after hearing thereon and on such notice as the court may have prescribed and after it is shown that the consideration for such sale, assignment, release, or satisfaction has been paid."

Kansas (1930 Supp., Rev. Stat., ch. 9, sec. 130): "* * * Such receiver shall, upon the order of a court of competent jurisdiction, or the judge thereof in chambers, upon the application of the bank commissioner, sell or compound all bad or doubtful debts due to the bank and sell all personal property of such bank on such terms as the court shall direct, and may, upon like order of such court, sell all real property of such bank on such terms as the court shall direct, and shall, if necessary to pay the debts of such bank, enforce the individual liability of the stockholders * * *."

Kentucky: Carroll's Statutes (Baldwin ed.) 1930, section 616. "The Secretary of State, upon becoming satisfied that any bank or corporation has become insolvent, or that its capital has become, and is permitted to remain, impaired, or that it has violated any of the provisions of the law under which it was organized, may, with the approval of the Attorney General, apply to the circuit court, or judge thereof in vacation, of the county in which the bank or corporation is located, for the appointment of a receiver, who, under the direction of the court or judge, shall take possession of the books, papers, and assets of every description, and all business of the bank or corporation, and collect all collectible debts and demands, and sell or compound, under the order of the court, all bad debts, and sell all the real and personal property of the bank or corporation, on such terms as the court may direct * * *."

Louisiana: Statutes, 1920, pages 99–100. "That whenever, under a judgment of a court of competent jurisdiction, the charter of a bank organized under the laws of the State of Louisiana will have been forfeited, and liquidators appointed by the court for the purpose of closing the affairs of such bank, the said liquidators shall be invested with the same authority as is provided for in the liquidation of banks through the State examiner of State banks in the matter of collecting moneys or managing the affairs of the defunct bank, as well as on the order of the district court of its domicile, to sell or compound all doubtful debts, and sell all real and personal property, on such terms and in such manner as the said court shall direct, and as may be done in the case of banks liquidated through the State bank examiner."

Massachusetts (Cumulative Statutes 1927, ch. 167, sec. 24): "* * * He (the commissioner) shall collect all debts due and claims belonging to it, and upon the order or decree of the supreme judicial court, or any justice thereof, may sell or compound all bad or doubtful debts, and on like order or decree may sell all, or any part of, the real and personal property of the bank on such terms as the court shall direct * * *."

Michigan (Compiled Laws 1929, sec. 11959): "* * * The receiver, if any be appointed, shall, under the direction of the court, take possession of the books, records, and assets of every description of such bank, collect all debts, dues, and claims belonging to it, and sell or compound all bad or doubtful assets and sell all the real and personal property of such bank, on such terms as the court shall direct, and may, if necessary, to pay the debts of such bank, enforce all individual liabilities of the stockholders. * * *."

Minnesota (Mason's Statutes 1927, sec. 7689): "The public examiner shall collect all debts due and all claims belonging to such bank, and, upon the order of the district court, may sell or compound all bad or doubtful debts, and on like order may sell all the real and personal property of such bank on such terms as the court shall direct, and may, if necessary to pay the debts of such bank, enforce the individual liability of the stockholders. * * *."

Mississippi (Code 1930, sec. 3817): "* * * By and with the consent of the court or of the chancellor in vacation evidenced by an order entered in the liquidation proceedings he may sell any of the property, real, personal, or mixed, belonging to the bank either at private or public sale, and a deed made by him under the seal and attested by the secretary of the State banking department shall convey to the purchaser all of the rights, title, and interest of the bank and of the State banking department in any such property. * * *."

Missouri (Revised Statutes, 1929, sec. 5330): "* * * He (the commissioner) may, upon an order of the circuit court, or judge thereof in vacation, sell or compound all bad or doubtful debts held by, and compromise claims against, such corporation or banker, other than deposit claims, and, upon such terms as the court or judge thereof in vacation shall direct, may sell or otherwise dispose of all or any of the real and personal property of such corporation or banker. * * *."

Montana (Revised Codes, Supp. 1923–1927, sec. 6014.127, p. 750): "* * * He (the superintendent) may institute, in his own name as superintendent, or in the name of the bank, such suits and actions and other legal proceedings as he deems expedient for such purposes, and by making application to the district court of the county in which such bank is located, or to the judge thereof, in chambers, may procure an order to sell, compromise, or compound any bad or doubtful debts or claims, and to sell and dispose of any or all the assets, which sale may be made to stockholders, officers, directors, or others interested in such bank, on consent of the court. * * *."

Nevada (Compiled Laws, 1929, sec. 703): "Upon taking possession of the property and business of such bank the examiner is authorized to collect moneys due to such bank and do such other acts as are necessary to conserve its assets and business, and shall proceed to liquidate the affairs thereof as hereinafter provided. The examiner shall collect all debts and claims and enforce all liabilities and rights of action accrued to or belonging to such bank, and may institute and prosecute all proper and necessary actions for that purpose, and may sell or compound all bad or doubtful debts, and upon the order of the district court for the county where the bank carried on business may sell all the real and personal property of such bank on such terms as the court shall direct, and may, if necessary to pay the debts of such bank, if a corporation, enforce the individual liability of its stockholders. * * *."

New Hampshire (Public Laws, 1926, p. 1059, sec. 5): "Upon taking possession of the property and business of any institution to which this chapter applies, the commissioner shall have authority to collect money due the institution and to do such other acts as are necessary to conserve its assets and business. He shall collect all debts due and claims belonging to it, and, upon the order of the superior court or any justice thereof, may sell or compound all bad or doubtful debts; and on like order may sell all or any part of the real and personal property of the institution on such terms as the court shall direct."

New Jersey (Cumulative Supp., Rev. Stats., 1911–1924, secs. 17–24, p. 122): "* * * The commissioner shall collect all debts due and claims belonging to it, and upon the order of the court of chancery may sell or compound all bad or doubtful debts, and on like order may sell all the real and personal property of such bank on such terms as the court shall direct * * *."

New Mexico (Statutes Annotated, 1929, secs. 32–175): "The district court, at the time of ordering said injunction, or at any time afterwards, may appoint a receiver or receivers or trustees for the creditors and stockholders of the corporation, with full power and authority to demand, sue for, collect, receive, and take into their possession all the goods and chattels, rights and credit, moneys and effects, lands and tenements, books, papers, choses in action, bills, notes, and property of every description of the corporation, and to institute suits at law or in equity for the recovery of any estate, property, damages, or demands existing in favor of the corporation, and in his or their discretion to compound and settle with any debtor or creditor of the corporation, or with persons having possession of its property or in any way responsible at law or in equity to the corporation at the time of its insolvency or suspension of business, or afterwards upon such terms and in such manner as he or they shall deem just and beneficial to the corporation, and in case of mutual dealings between the corporation and any person to allow just offsets in favor of such person in all cases in which the same ought to be allowed according to law and equity; a debtor who shall have in good faith paid his debt to the corporation without notice of its insolvency or suspension of business, shall not be liable therefor, and the receiver or receivers or trustees shall have power to sell, convey, and assign all the said estate, rights, and interests, and shall hold and dispose of the proceeds thereof under the directions of the district court; the word receiver as used in this article shall be construed to include receivers and trustees appointed as provided in this article."

New York (Cahill's Consolidated Laws, 1930, ch. 3, sec. 69): " * * * He (the superintendent) may, upon an order of the supreme court, sell or compound all bad or doubtful debts held by and compromise claims against such corporation, banker, or broker, other than deposit claims, and, upon such terms as the court shall direct, may sell or otherwise dispose of all or any of the real and personal property of such corporation, banker, or broker. * * *"

North Carolina (Code, 1931, sec. 218 (c) (7)): " * * * The commissioner of banks, or the duly appointed agent, shall collect all debts due and claims belonging to such bank, by suit, if necessary; and, by motion in the pending action and upon authority of an order of the presiding or resident judge of the district, may sell, compromise, or compound any bad or doubtful debt or claim; and may, upon such order, sell the real and personal property of such bank on such terms as the order may provide or direct. * * *"

North Dakota (Laws, 1931, ch. 96, p. 162): "Upon the filing of the complaint aforesaid the supreme court shall appoint a receiver, or two joint receivers, of all said insolvent banks, which receiver shall have all the powers and authority ordinarily possessed and exercised by receivers of insolvent corporations or prescribed by statute, and the court shall have all the powers and authority with regard to the administration and closing of the affairs of such banks as are ordinarily possessed and exercised by courts of equity over the affairs of insolvent corporations. * * *"

Compiled Laws, 1913, sec. 7591: "The receiver has, under the control of the court, power to bring and defend actions in his own name as receiver, to take and keep possession of the property, to receive rents, collect debts, to compound for and compromise the same, to make transfers, and generally to do such acts respecting the property as the court may authorize."

Ohio (Throckmorton's Ann. Code, 1930, secs. 710–795): " * * * The superintendent of banks shall collect all debts due and claims belonging to it, and upon the order of the common pleas court in and for the county in which the office of such bank was located, may sell or compound all bad or doubtful debts, and on like order may sell the real estate and personal property of such bank, on such terms as the court shall direct * * *."

Oregon (Code 1930, vol. 2, secs. 22–2012, p. 2020): " * * * The superintendent of banks shall collect the debts due and claims belonging to it and, upon the order of the circuit court in and for the judicial district in which the office of such bank or trust company was located, may sell or compound any bad or doubtful debts, and, on like order, may sell all or any of the real estate and personal property of such bank or trust company, on such terms as the court shall direct; * * *."

Pennsylvania (Statutes 1920, secs. 1273, 1277, 1283):

"SEC. 1273. Except as herein otherwise provided, the commissioner shall, when he has taken possession of the business and property of a corporation or person, have all the rights, powers, and duties of a receiver appointed by any court of equity in this Commonwealth; and he shall be vested, in his official capacity, with all the property of such corporation or person, including debts due, liens or securities therefor, and rights of action or redemption."

"SEC. 1277. The commissioner may sell at public sale any or all of the real and personal property of such corporation or person without any order of court. He may, with leave of court, sell either real or personal property at private sale. At least 10 days' notice of any petition for leave to sell at private sale shall be given to all stockholders of such corporation, or to such person, and to all creditors known to the commissioner; and such notice shall also be advertised at least once in a newspaper in the county where the banking house or other place of business is located, and, when the land is situated in a different county, at least once in a newspaper published in the latter county."

"SEC. 1283. The commissioner may, with leave of court, compound or compromise any debt or claim due to the corporation or person, and discontinue any action or other proceeding pending therefor, if done in good faith and after proper inquiry; and, upon payment of the amount due, may require all mortgages, conditional contracts, pledges, and liens, of or upon any real or personal property of such corporation or person, to be satisfied, canceled, or assigned to him, as he may deem best, or he may sell the property subject thereto."

Rhode Island (General Laws 1923, sec. 4025, p. 1195): " * * * The court may appoint such receiver or receivers to take possession of the property and effects of such corporation, subject to such directions as may from time to time be prescribed by the court, and the appointment of said receiver or receivers shall vest in him or them all the right, title, and interest of such corporation in and to its property and effects, and shall vacate and dissolve all attachments or liens thereon, created by or obtained in or pursuant to any suit or proceeding at law or in equity against said corporation which was begun within four months before the appointment of said receiver or receivers, and such receiver or receivers shall have all the powers and be subject to all the duties conferred or imposed upon receivers by the provisions of sections 57 to 63, inclusive, of chapter 248 of the general laws. * * *"

General Laws 1923, section 3523, pages 1000–1001: "Such receiver shall take charge of any such corporation's estate and effects of which he has been appointed receiver, and he shall collect the debts and property belonging to it. He shall have power to prosecute and defend suits in its name or otherwise, to intervene in any action, suit, or proceeding relating to such estate or effects, and to appoint agents under him. He shall have power, under the direction of the court, to preserve the assets of such corporation, to carry on its business, to sell and convert such assets and property into cash, to redeem any mortgages, conditional contracts, pledges, or liens of or upon any such property, refer any controversy or dispute concerning any such property to arbitration, compromise any controversy or dispute concerning any such property, and generally to do all other acts which might be done by such corporation, or that may be necessary for the administration of his trust, according to the course of equity."

South Dakota (Laws 1931, ch. 88): " * * * He (the superintendent) shall collect all debts due and claims belonging to it and may upon order of the circuit court, after having made application therefor, sell or compound any or all bad or doubtful debts, and on like order may sell all or any of the real and personal property of such bank or trust company on such terms as the court shall direct: Provided, That all sales shall be made on competitive bids after advertisement for 10 days in the official papers in the county in which the property is located * * *."

Tennessee. Code 1932 (Williams, Shannon and Harsh), sections 5973, 5974:

"SEC. 5973. Upon so taking possession, the superintendent is authorized to collect moneys due to such corporation, firm, or individual banker, and to do such other acts as are necessary to conserve its assets and business, and shall proceed to liquidate the affairs thereof as hereinafter provided. The superintendent shall collect all debts due and claims belonging to the bank, and may sell or compound all doubtful debts, and sell all real estate upon such terms as the said chancery court may direct.

"SEC. 5974. If, after the superintendent has so taken possession, such bank shall fail to make good all deficits in observance of law and resume business as provided herein, the superintendent shall have power and authority, by and with the consent of a majority of the directors (in case of a corporation) or a majority of the executive officers (in case of an individual or firm bank), to sell all the assets of such bank to any solvent existing bank at such price as the superintendent may consider a fair and reasonable value for all such assets, allowing such purchasing bank to assume the full amount due all creditors of the liquidating bank and paying the remainder of the purchase price, if any, to such liquidating bank."

Texas (Complete Statutes, 1928, art. 454, p. 79): "Upon the order of the district court of the county in which such bank was located, if in session, or the judge thereof, if in vacation, the commissioner may sell or compound all bad or doubtful debts, and may sell the real or personal property of such State bank on such terms as the court shall direct."

Utah (Laws 1923, ch. 33): " * * * The bank commissioner shall collect all debts due and claims belonging to it, and upon the order of the district court in and for the county in which the office of such bank is located, may sell or compound all bad or doubtful debts, and on like order may sell the real estate and personal property of such bank, on such terms as the court shall direct * * *."

Vermont (General Laws, 1917, sec. 5404): "The receiver shall collect, sue for, and receive the debts and demands due and the property that belongs to the bank, and shall convert into cash its real and personal estate, and make report to the court of the condition of the trust at such times as the chancellor orders."

Washington (Remington's Compiled Statutes, 1922, sec. 3269): " * * * With the approval of the superior court of the county in which such corporation is located, he may sell, compound, or compromise bad or doubtful debts and, upon such terms as the court shall direct, sell all real estate and personal property of such corporation * * *."

West Virginia (Code, 1931, p. 843): " * * * The receiver, under the authority of the commissioner of banking, shall institute and prosecute any suit or suits necessary to obtain possession of any property and to sell and dispose of the same and to collect all obligations due such institution or other corporation * * *."

Wisconsin (Statutes, 1929, sec. 220.08 (3), p. 1779): " * * * The commissioner shall collect all debts due and claims belonging to it, and, upon the order of the circuit court, may sell or compound all bad or doubtful debts, and on like order may sell all the real and personal property of such bank or banking corporation on such terms as the court shall direct; * * *."

Wyoming (Laws, 1925, ch. 157, p. 230): " * * * The State examiner shall collect all debts due and claims belonging to it, and, upon the order of the district court in and for the judicial district in which the office of such bank was located, may sell or compound all bad or doubtful debts, and, on like order, may sell all the real estate and personal property of such bank, on such terms as the court shall direct; * * *."

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. GARBER].

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks and to incorporate therein certain tables furnished by the several departments and several editorials on the matter which I am about to discuss.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. GARBER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, I desire to call your attention for a short time to a legislative proposal the purpose of which is to give jobs to the unemployed without calling for any additional appropriation. This is a departure from the general character of legislation proposed during this session, and because of its very uniqueness ought to receive your considerate attention.

In his letter of January 26, 1932, to the Speaker of this House, the President of the United States, in substance, recommended authority be granted to the several departments and executive heads of the Government to exercise their judgment in the purchase of goods of domestic origin, giving preference in such purchases to products produced at home, if in their judgment the price was not unreasonable, even though foreign goods were offered at a lesser price.

That suggestion was received by the Speaker, and I have searched the RECORD in vain for a reply. So I here voluntarily suggest a reply to the President in that respect, and that is that the doctrine expressed in the letter, namely, buy at home, keep your money at home, and give your employment to American citizens, is universally approved by the citizenship of the country, regardless of political affiliations.

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARBER. Yes.

Mr. PATMAN. The Government has the authority at this time to use cotton cord instead of jute in the Post Office Department, has it not?

Mr. GARBER. Yes.

Mr. PATMAN. Cotton is a domestic product, and jute is produced wholly in a foreign country by cheap labor. Does the gentleman not think his illustration should apply to that?

Mr. GARBER. The authority as yet has not been granted to the department head to exercise discretion, if in his judgment the price is not unreasonable.

Mr. PATMAN. Under the present law the Postmaster General has the authority to use cotton if he desires to use it.

Mr. GARBER. If that is the law, then it is a case of bad administration in not giving preference to an American product.

Mr. PATMAN. Certainly.

Mr. BARBOUR. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARBER. Yes.

Mr. BARBOUR. A provision similar to the one the gentleman has just described was written into the War Department appropriation bill last year, and is a part of the War Department appropriation act for the current fiscal year. We are told by the officials of the War Department that it is working very satisfactorily.

Mr. GARBER. I thank the gentleman for his informative statement. I think this preference should be exercised not only by all of the department and the executive heads of the Government but that it ought to be exercised by the consuming public as well. This Congress ought to take some action, especially during this depression, when we have such a vast army of unemployed asking not for charity but for jobs and the retention of their independence.

Mr. TILSON. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARBER. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Following up the statement of the gentleman from California [Mr. BARBOUR], let me say that his colleague [Mrs. KAHN] has introduced a bill providing for the very thing the gentleman from Oklahoma is now talking so eloquently about.

Mr. GARBER. I am very glad, indeed, to have that information.

Mr. TILSON. There is such a bill now pending before some committee of the House.

Mr. GARBER. I hope that it will be favorably reported by the committee and enacted into law.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARBER. Yes.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. The gentleman started off with the statement that there was a message from the White House in the form of a letter to the Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. GARBER. Yes.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. What could the Speaker do other than to file the letter with the House of Representatives?

Mr. GARBER. Could not the Speaker have replied to the letter something like this?—

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: I herewith acknowledge the receipt of your letter and assure you that, in so far as I am informed, the party which I represent is in favor of the policy of buying at home and giving the work to our unemployed.

[Applause.]

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Does not the gentleman know that the Speaker and the Speaker's party have always been for that policy without having to write such a letter in reply?

Mr. GARBER. Then why not give that assurance to the country?

Mr. DICKSTEIN. Will the gentleman point out when at any time it was necessary for the late Speaker Longworth or any other Speaker to acknowledge a letter from the White House in the form suggested by the gentleman from Oklahoma?

Mr. GARBER. Oh, I have not had occasion to go back through the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to find precedents for such a reply, but it seems to me that it would be information that would have been appreciated by the public.

Mr. DICKSTEIN. The gentleman is insisting that the Speaker in this instance ought to have written an acknowledgment of the letter, as the gentleman put it, but there is no precedent for any such procedure in this House that I know of.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GARBER. Yes.

Mr. BOYLAN. The gentleman will recall that within the last couple of weeks our distinguished colleague from Massachusetts [Mr. LUCE] held that we should address the Speaker, and that in addressing the Speaker we addressed the House, so really, to follow the construction of that distinguished and able parliamentarian and scholar, in addressing a letter to the Speaker of the House the President really addressed the House and not the Speaker individually but the House collectively. Is not that correct?

Mr. GARBER. The construction of the gentleman from Massachusetts might possibly be applied in that way; however, I am not here to go into that phase of the question to any further length.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield to me for an observation?

Mr. GARBER. Yes.

Mr. COX. Is the gentleman advocating the cutting off in its entirety of commerce with foreign powers?

Mr. GARBER. Certainly not. But I say to the gentleman in answer to that question, that when any nation purchases abroad that which it can produce economically by its own labor and soil facilities, it is following an uneconomic policy which no nation should demand of another. Further answering the gentleman, when we buy our rubber, our coffee, our tea, our sugar, our silks and satins, and other commodities from foreign nations because we do not produce those commodities in this country we are performing our full commercial duty to those foreign countries. They ought not to expect us to buy from them that which we can produce at home. [Applause.]

Mr. COX. But not all of the powers produce rubber and sugar and coffee and the commodities which the gentleman mentioned.

Mr. GARBER. That is true.

Mr. COX. There are others who are producing upon a competitive basis with the producers of this country. What does the gentleman say with respect to cutting off all commerce with those countries as far as it affects commodities that are produced at home?

Mr. GARBER. I will say to the gentleman that I am not in favor of giving to foreign countries labor which we should give to our unemployed at home. [Applause.] The remedy for unemployment is not in the purchase of goods produced by cheap labor in foreign countries with a lower standard of living. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. SHREVE. I yield to the gentleman from Oklahoma five additional minutes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GARBER. During the years 1929 to 1931, inclusive, there was imported into this country free of duty crude petroleum and its refined products of the value of $377,321,374, every dollar of which should have been used in the purchase of such products produced at home. [Applause.] Surely, when we have an oversupply of products at home superior in quality our policy should be to purchase from our own people and give them preference, a policy to which the President has referred in his letter of January 26. In view of the refusal to consider an oil tariff bill our suggestion to the Committee on Ways and Means is to put a tax on the imports of oil and its refined products, high enough to insure our home market to our home producers and employment to the unemployed in our oil fields at home.

Mr. PATMAN. I am with the gentleman on that proposition. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARBER. I am glad to learn the gentleman is in favor of such legislation.

In this case it is not monopolistic corporations who appear before the Ways and Means Committee seeking special privilege. In this case the demand comes from the independent producers of oil, the little fellows in the game, and from the unemployed workers in the oil fields of our country.

You gentlemen on the Democratic side have always claimed that you were for the under dog in your economic policies. Give us your votes for the under dog in securing a tax which will be adequate to afford that degree of protection which will give the American market to the American producer and the American worker. [Applause.]

Mr. FULBRIGHT. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GARBER. I regret that I am unable to yield further, because of the limited time at my disposal.

Who is opposing the buying of oil and refined products at home when we have an oversupply and unemployed workers in our oil fields at home? Who is opposing it? The four major monopolistic oil companies, with all their subsidiaries. They are importing 82 per cent of the oil and oil products into this country.

It is this group that is importing cheap oils from their foreign concessions, produced by cheap peon labor and making enormous profits out of the consuming public in this country. Their imports are dumped into the Atlantic seaboard States where they exact a higher price for their gasoline than that charged the consumers in the interior States furnished from the midcontinent field.

It is this group that has been piling up increased dividends during these years of depression until they reached their highest peak in the year of lowest depression, namely, in 1930, $286,000,000.

It is this same group that owns the pipe lines and controls the transportation of crude to market which the Tariff Commission reported as making a weighted charge of 49 cents per barrel for transportation or 48½ per cent of the cost of producing the oil.

The following table, incomplete, will show the enormous profits being made by a few of the principal pipe lines under their control, according to the bureau of statistics of the Interstate Commerce Commission:

Pipe-line companies:	Per cent dividends, 1930
Gulf Pipe Line of Oklahoma	400
Humble Pipe Line	40
Shell	54.1
Magnolia	40
Oklahoma Pipe Line	30
Stanolind (Standard Oil of Indiana, parent company of the Pan American)	61.54

The pipe lines should be divorced from production. They should be made common carriers in fact as well as in name. They post the price which the independents must take or withhold their oil in the wells because they have not sufficient storage. The price posted by the pipe lines is in fact the price fixed by the monopolistic companies. They are fixing it sufficiently low to crush out the independents, making up their losses through their pipe lines, refineries, and distributing agencies.

In his letter of January 26, 1932, to the Speaker of this House the President, urging the purchase of goods of domestic origin by the departments and executive heads of the Government, said:

> It would be of substantial advantage to American manufacturers and purchasers if Congress should authorize all departments and executive establishments uniformly to give preference in purchase of supplies to goods of domestic origin, and I suggest the enactment of legislation providing that in advertising for proposals for supplies heads of departments shall require bidders to certify whether the articles proposed to be furnished are of domestic or foreign growth, production, or manufacture, and shall (if in their judgment the excess of cost is not unreasonable) purchase or contract for the delivery of articles of the growth, production, or manufacture of the United States, notwithstanding that articles of foreign origin may be offered at a lower price.
> Respectfully yours,
> HERBERT HOOVER.

By appropriate legislation this preference in purchase of domestic products should be extended and our people should buy home products. Our slogan should be: "Buy American products." Surely the remedy for our unemployment is not in the purchase of the products of foreign labor. It is rather in the purchase of the products of labor at home. [Applause.]

The demand for a tariff on oil is not a case where monopolistic companies are asking for protection; where special interests are seeking special privileges. The demand comes from the independent producers and American labor out of employment. The major companies are opposed to a tariff on oil and its refined products. They are demanding a continuation of the free admission of their imports, not in the public interest but for increased profits and dividends for the stockholders of their corporations.

Our imports of crude and refined oils come from Mexico, Venezuela, the Netherland West Indies, Colombia, Peru, Ecuador, and the Island of Trinidad. The products of these countries are produced for export, less than 5 per cent being consumed in the countries of production.

With these foreign products from cheap concessions and cheap peon labor, they are absorbing the home market, displacing American labor, bankrupting the independents, buying in their properties at forced sales, crushing out competition, and regaining the monopolistic control which they lost by Supreme Court decision in 1911.

The preservation of competition furnished by the independents is a necessary protection to the consuming public. A tariff on oil and its refined products or a tax on such imports high enough to afford adequate protection will enable the producers by curtailment to stabilize their production and give the job of supplying the home market to our unemployed at home. [Applause.]

Because the United States is an oil-exporting Nation it is claimed that the imports of oil and its refined products should be admitted free of duty. While we give 1929 figures, the rates in the 1930 tariff act will show that such is not a test of protection.

Supplying the facts, we insert the following table, although its list of items is very incomplete. They are taken from the 1929 report of the United States Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce. They will show, however, that the exports of eastern industries exceed their imports by millions, and yet they are highly protected in every instance; that opposition based upon such grounds is not considered. In the following list the total exports of the several items amounted to $1,725,000,000, while the imports total only $172,000,000, and yet there is a protective duty on every item in the list.

Incomplete list of miscellaneous products of which we exported more than we imported in the calendar year 1929 and which were dutiable under the tariff law

[Data compiled from reports of United States Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce]

Product	Imports	Exports
Iron and steel, semimanufactured	$11,003,000	$104,148,000
Steel mill products (99 per cent)[1]	18,173,000	96,048,000
Iron, steel, advanced manufacture	8,988,000	87,003,000
Electrical machinery, apparatus	2,664,000	121,365,000
Industrial machinery, office appliances, and printing machinery	24,838,000	350,569,000
Automobiles and other vehicles	5,151,000	588,023,000
Animal oils and fats, edible	170,000	117,714,000
Cotton, manufactured	63,454,000	111,216,000
Wood, manufactured (98 per cent)	10,838,000	40,934,000
Pigments, paints, and varnishes	3,821,000	29,119,000
Soaps, toilet preparations (85 per cent)	6,941,000	16,059,000
Photographic goods	7,959,000	31,566,000
Scientific and professional instruments	4,074,000	12,415,000
Musical instruments	4,503,000	18,932,000
Total	172,577,000	1,725,111,000
Duty free—Petroleum, crude	79,943,000	37,800,000
Duty free—Petroleum, refined	61,023,000	493,373,000
Total	140,966,000	531,173,000

[1] A few items in this classification were exempt—and 99 per cent of the total value of all steel-mill products, 98 per cent of wood, and 85 per cent of soaps, paid a duty.

The second objection by the importing companies is that because the ratio of our imports to our consumption is only 10 per cent, neither a tariff nor a tax on imports is justified. Dump 10 per cent of cheap foreign products upon a glutted market for the products of any American industry and you will demoralize the market and in time, destroy the industry. Even the constant threat of free imports, where the supply and capital are unlimited, will keep the market in a continuous state of anarchy. Such has been the status of the market for oil and its products in this country because of the free importations by the major companies.

The following will show that 10 per cent importations did not preclude rates for the adequate protection of the products of eastern industries:

IRON IN PIGS

Tariff rate, 1930 (par. 301, Schedule 3): $1.12½ per ton.
Ratio of imports to consumption: 1.46 per cent in amount.

WROUGHT IRON

Paragraph 303, Schedule 3: Valued at not above 1½ cents per pound, three-tenths of 1 cent per pound; valued above 1½ and not above 2½ cents per pound, five-tenths of 1 cent per pound; valued above 2½ and not above 3½ cents per pound, eight-tenths of 1 cent per pound; valued above 3½ and not above 5 cents per pound, 1 cent per pound; valued above 5 cents per pound, 1½ cents per pound.

Ratio of imports to consumption: 2.55 per cent in amount.

STEEL INGOTS, ETC.

Tariff rate, 1930 (par. 304, Schedule 3): From three-tenths of 1 cent per pound for those valued at not above 1½ cents per pound to 20 per cent ad valorem for those valued above 16 cents per pound.

Ratio of imports to consumption: 0.03 per cent in amount.

STEEL BARS

Paragraph 304, Schedule 3: Same rates as above designated.
Ratio of imports to consumption: 1.99 per cent in amount.

SHEETS OF IRON OR STEEL

Tariff rate, 1930 (par. 308, Schedule 3): Ranging from forty-five one-hundredths of 1 cent per pound for that valued at 3 cents per pound or less, and thinner than one-hundred-nine one-thousandths of 1 inch to eighty-five one-hundredths of 1 cent per pound for that valued at 3 cents per pound or less and thinner than ten one-thousandths of 1 inch; corrugated or crimped, seventy-five one-hundredths of 1 cent per pound; all foregoing when valued at more than 3 cents per pound 20 per cent ad valorem.

Ratio of imports to consumption: 0.30 per cent in amount.

STRUCTURAL SHAPES OF IRON OR STEEL

Tariff rate, 1930 (par. 312, Schedule 3): Not assembled, manufactured, or advanced beyond hammering, rolling, or casting, one-fifth of 1 cent per pound; machined, drilled, punched, assembled, fitted, fabricated for use, or otherwise advanced beyond hammering, rolling, or casting, 20 per cent ad valorem; sashes and frames of iron or steel, 25 per cent ad valorem; sheet piling, one-fifth of 1 cent per pound.

Ratio of imports to consumption: 4.37 per cent in amount.

HOOPS, BANDS, AND SCROLLS OF IRON OR STEEL

Tariff rate, 1930 (par. 313, Schedule 3): Hoop, band, and scroll iron or steel, not specially provided for, valued at 3 cents per pound or less, 8 inches or less in width, and thinner than three-eighths and not thinner than one hundred and nine one-thousandths of 1 inch, twenty-five one-hundredths of 1 cent per pound, to fifty-five one-hundredths of 1 cent per pound where thinner than thirty-eight one-thousandths of 1 inch. Barrel hoops of iron or steel, and hoop or band iron, or hoop or band steel, flared, splayed, or punched, with or without buckles or fastenings, shall pay no more duty than that imposed on the hoop or band iron or steel from which they are made; bands and strips of iron or steel, whether in long or in short lengths, not specially provided for, 25 per cent ad valorem.

Ratio of imports to consumption: 3.68 per cent in amount.

Tariff rate, 1930 (par. 314, Schedule 3): Hoop or band iron, and hoop or band steel, cut to lengths, or wholly or partly manufactured into hoops or ties, coated or not coated with paint or any other preparation, with or withut buckles or fastenings, for baling cotton or any other commodity, one-fourth of 1 cent per pound.

BOLTS, NUTS, AND WASHERS

	Domestic production	Imports for consumption	Ratio of imports to consumption (per cent)
Pounds	807,765,200	667,851	0.09
Value	$95,893,944	$40,828	.04

1930 tariff rate (par. 330, Schedule 3): Nuts, nut blanks, and washers, of wrought iron or steel, six-tenths of 1 cent per pound; bolts, with or without threads or nuts, and bolt blanks, of iron or steel, 1 cent per pound; spiral nut locks, and lock washers, of iron or steel, 35 per cent ad valorem.

CUT NAILS AND SPIKES

Tariff rate, 1930 (par. 331, Schedule 3): Cut nails and cut spikes, of iron or steel, exceeding 2 inches in length, four-tenths of 1 cent per pound; cut tacks and brads, hobnails and cut nails, of iron or steel, not exceeding 2 inches in length, 15 per cent ad valorem; horseshoe nails and other iron or steel nails, not specially provided for, 1½ cents per pound; upholsterers' nails, chair glides, and thumb tacks, of two or more pieces of iron or steel, finished or unfinished, 3 cents per pound; nails, spikes, tacks, brads, and staples, made of iron or steel wire, not less than 1 inch in length nor smaller than sixty-five one thousandths of 1 inch in diameter, four-tenths of 1 cent per pound; less than 1 inch in length and smaller than sixty-five-one thousandths of 1 inch in diameter, three-fourths of 1 cent per pound; staples, in strip form, for use in paper fasteners or stapling machines, 2 cents per pound; spikes, tacks, brads, and staples not specially provided for, six-tenths of 1 cent per pound.

Ratio of imports to consumption: 2.92 per cent in amount.

WIRE NAILS AND SPIKES

Tariff rate, 1930 (see par. 331, Schedule 3).
Ratio of imports to consumption: 0.70 per cent in amount.

SADDLERY AND HARNESS HARDWARE

Tariff rate, 1930 (par. 345, Schedule 3): Saddlery and harness hardware: Buckles, rings, snaps, bits, swivels, and all other articles of iron, steel, brass, composition, or other metal, not plated with gold or silver, commonly or commercially known as harness hardware, 35 per cent ad valorem; all articles of iron, steel, brass, composition, or other metal, not plated with gold or silver, commonly or commercially known as saddlery or riding bridle hardware, 50 per cent ad valorem; all the foregoing, if plated with gold or silver, 60 per cent ad valorem.

Value: Domestic production, $5,225,324; imports for consumption, $73,342.

Ratio of imports to consumption: 1.44 per cent.

POCKETKNIVES

Tariff rate, 1930 (par. 354, Schedule 3): Valued at not more than 40 cents a dozen, 1¼ cents each and 50 per cent ad valorem; valued at more than 40 and not more than 50 cents per dozen, 5 cents each and 50 per cent ad valorem; valued at more than 50 cents and not more than $1.25 per dozen, 11 cents each and 55 per cent ad valorem; valued at more than $1.25 and not more than $3 per dozen, 18 cents each and 55 per cent ad valorem; valued at more than $3 and not more than $6 per dozen, 25 cents each and 50 per cent ad valorem; valued at more than $6 per dozen, 35 cents each and 55 per cent ad valorem.

Ratio of imports to consumption: 4.4 per cent in value.

SEWING MACHINES

Tariff rate, 1930 (par. 372, Schedule 3): Sewing machines, not specially provided for, valued at not more than $75 each, 15 per cent ad valorem; at more than $75 each, 30 per cent ad valorem.

Value: Domestic production, $45,221,816; imports for consumption, $527,568.

Ratio of imports to consumption: 1.5 per cent.

CASH REGISTERS

Tariff rate, 1030: 25 per cent ad valorem.

Value: Domestic production, $40,183,284; imports for consumption, $2,658.

Ratio of imports to consumption: Less than 0.05 per cent.

LAWN MOWERS

Tariff rate, 1930: 30 per cent at valorem.
Value: Domestic production, $8,046,961; imports for consumption, $8.
Ratio of imports to consumption: Less than 0.05 per cent.

SHOVELS, SPADES, ETC.

Tariff rate, 1930: 30 per cent ad valorem.
Value: Domestic production, $16,000,000; imports for consumption, $10,040.
Ratio of imports to consumption: 0.06 per cent.

Why purchase oil and refined products abroad when we have a surplus supply at home, with 350,000 workers in the oil fields out of employment? [Applause.]

The American Federation of Labor, through its representative, appeared before the House Ways and Means Committee, demanding in the name of labor that adequate protection be accorded the oil industry. Among other things, he said:

We are asking that American markets be reserved for American products in order that American labor may maintain American standards of living; that we may have for our jobs that degree of security to which we are entitled. In this is involved the welfare of the American home, the prosperity of American communities in oil-producing areas now threatened with complete bankruptcy if we continue to turn over American markets to the products of peon labor in foreign fields.

During the years 1929–1931, inclusive, there was imported, free of duty, crude petroleum and refined products of the value of $377,321,374. This enormous amount should have been expended for home products, giving employment to home labor. It would have permitted our producers to raise their proration, operate their refineries, furnish employment to the unemployed, cargoes of oil to the now idle fleets of tankers, employment to American seamen, renewal of rentals to the farmers and the restoration of their royalty values. The $377,321,374 would have been distributed among our own people in the 19 oil-producing States, in turn helping all industries and sections of our country.

The House Ways and Means Committee has heard the case of oil. The importers and eastern industries appeared in opposition to a tariff or tax. The independent producers and the American Federation of Labor appeared in support, demanding protection. Leading Democratic members of the committee, following precedent, have expressed their opposition to the consideration of an oil tariff during this session.

The refusal to consider a bill providing adequate protection, however, does not relieve the committee of its responsibility to afford such relief to the industry. It is now considering a tax bill and has jurisdiction to levy a tax in sufficient amount on crude and its refined products to effect the same purpose as a tariff. To do this, the tax must be high enough to minimize imports. A tax for revenue will not do this. A tax for revenue would but assure the importers of a continuation of their preference in the American market which would encourage development of their cheap concessions and but increase the flood of imports into this country. During the last several years, when tariff legislation has threatened, they have been restrained through fear of legislation to limit their imports in amount to what they thought public opinion would stand. A tax for revenue would remove this restraint, and increased imports would be the natural result.

In order to be of any benefit, the tax must be high enough to insure the home market to our home producers, to give them the preference which is accorded to all American industries. This, in turn, will stabilize production, encourage a renewal of operations, of the investment of capital, of development, the reemployment of labor now idle, the renewal of leases to the farmers, the restoration of royalty values and the quick recovery of the industry to prosperous times, the radiation of which will be helpful to all industries and all sections of the country. [Applause.]

The following table, prepared by the Bureau of Domestic and Foreign Commerce, shows that 11 of the leading countries of Europe, consumers of oil and its by-products, have levied import taxes on such products for revenue with which to balance the budgets of their respective governments.

I commend a study of this table to the members of the House Ways and Means Committee with the suggestion that in fixing a tax on oil imports insuring adequate protection, the fear of losing free markets abroad for our exports should be dispelled by the action shown to have already been taken.

Will a tax on imports increase the price of gasoline? This has not been the result in other commodities carrying a tariff rate where competition prevails. In such case, how will it benefit the producers and oil workers? It will give them the job of furnishing our home people with oil and gasoline now furnished by the importers from the cheap concessions.

The price of crude oil bears about the same relationship to the price of gasoline as the price of wheat bears to a loaf of bread or the price of raw material bears to the finished automobile. The years of 1926 and 1929 afford a familiar example of the price relationship of crude to gasoline. In February, 1926, the price of mid-continent crude oil was $2.04 a barrel, and in February, 1929, it was $1.20 a barrel. In December, 1930, it was $1.12 per barrel. In 52 representative cities, selected at random and widely situated throughout the United States, the price of gasoline averaged 18.9 cents per gallon in February, 1926, and 18.39 cents in February, 1930. In 1926 the refineries recovered an average of 36 per cent gasoline from the average barrel of crude run to stills, and in 1929 the average recovery had increased to 44 per cent. This means that in February, 1926, the refineries recovered 15.12 gallons of gasoline out of a barrel of crude that cost them $2.04, while in February, 1929, they recovered 18.39 gallons out of a barrel of crude that cost them $1.20.

From these figures it will be seen that if the price of crude oil had governed the price of gasoline, then the average price in these 52 cities in February, 1930, should have been 10.6 cents per gallon instead of 18.39 cents.

Take the case of your lubricating oil. When crude was selling for $1.45 per barrel, you paid from 25 to 35 cents per quart, and when crude at its present price is 70 cents per barrel, you still pay the 25 and 35 cents per quart. The price of crude oil is governed largely within the producing end of the industry, and the price of gasoline is governed almost entirely within the refining and marketing end of the industry.

The oil industry in normal times carries under lease potential oil lands for which, in addition to the bonuses paid, it pays to the farmers $1 per acre annual rental, which under the existing conditions it can not pay, meaning a loss to the farmers as follows:

Kansas (estimated)	$5,000,000
Texas (estimated)	12,000,000
Oklahoma	10,000,000
Louisiana	4,000,000
Arkansas	2,000,000
New Mexico	1,000,000
Colorado	1,000,000
Montana (estimated)	1,000,000
Mississippi	2,000,000
Other States	8,000,000
Estimated total annual loss (farm rentals)	46,000,000

To these farmer and fee-owner losses we must add one-eighth of the lost receipts from the sale of crude oil, or an added sum of $117,029,000, aggregating a loss by the forced depression to the farmers and fee owners of $163,029,000 per year. The lost buying power of this industry will no doubt result in another $50,000,000 loss to the farmers and fee owners in bonuses that would under fair conditions be paid them for another year.

It is estimated by high authority that more than 100,000 oil-field workmen in the mid-continent field are unemployed; that the ills of the industry are responsible for the unemployment and idleness among the allied groups and others of 150,000 workers; that in California there are—these figures are exact; that is, they are Government figures from Colonel Wood's department—in the California fields, 32,000 field workers alone unemployed, and nearly 50,000 of the allied groups and other workers unemployed by reason of the oil-field shutdown; that there are among field workers, allied groups, and others affected in other industries through other producing areas, more than 50,000 men. Taking these figures for the unemployed at $7 per day as the average wage of the oil-field workers—they are paid from $4.50 to $18, depending on experience and skill—taking the average of $7, we find that there is, on account of the forced depression of this industry, a cost to the wage earners of the country of $1,974,000 per day. That is a tremendous loss of wages, and then we wonder why so many are dependent on charity. A loss of $1,974,000 per day in these various producing areas, or the tremendous sum of $710,640,000 per annum.

The following letter, received from Paul Walker, chairman of the Corporation Commission of Oklahoma, shows the annual production and the gross production tax of the State of Oklahoma, which is a true index to the losses the State has sustained by reason of forced curtailment caused by free importations. It will be seen that receipts from the gross production tax of 3 cents have decreased since 1929 by reason of decreased production $6,094,139.90, a loss in revenues to the State which must be made up by direct taxes upon the people.

CORPORATION COMMISSION OF OKLAHOMA,
Oklahoma City, Okla., February 16, 1932.

Hon. M. C. GARBER,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR JUDGE GARBER: The attached copy of telegram is in response to your wire of the 15th instant:

The annual production for the years 1927–1931, both inclusive, is as follows:

	Barrels
1927	277,775,000
1928	249,857,000
1929	255,004,000
1930	216,486,000
1931	173,834,000

The annual gross production tax for the years 1927–1931, both inclusive, is as follows:

1927	$11,476,851.40
1928	10,063,957.57
1929	10,426,263.50
1930	8,816,372.76
1931	4,332,123.60

These figures are from the State tax commission.

If we can be of further service to you, please communicate with us.

Very truly yours,

PAUL A. WALKER, Chairman.

The following editorial, by one of the most brilliant writers in the State and publisher of the Blackwell Tribune, so graphically portrays the results of free imports to the State of Oklahoma that I insert it in full.

VITAL TO OKLAHOMA

From California to Texas the fight for a tariff on oil is on. Representatives and Senators from all the oil-producing States are armed for the battle. Of course, they can not win the fight alone. There are not enough of them to constitute a majority in Congress, even though there were no break in their ranks, but there is great reason for believing they will get the necessary help. The House must take the initiative, since all revenue-raising measures must originate with that body, but the House will lose no time in doing that. What is Oklahoma's interest in the matter?

Oklahoma has all the interest in a tariff on oil any State can have. Petroleum is one of the State's greatest industries. In 1928, and that was after the production curtailment and price-slashing program had been in progress for more than three years, Oklahoma produced 250,000,000 barrels of oil. Despite the fact that the big oil corporations had already forced a heavy reduction in prices, oil produced in Oklahoma that year was valued at $360,000,000. It yielded a gross production tax of $10,300,000. The total gross production tax on oil collected by the State for 1931 was $4,328,141. The use of a little arithmetic reveals a difference of $6,371,859 in gross production tax collections on oil between the years 1928 and 1931. Unrestricted importation of cheap foreign oil was directly responsible for that loss in income to the State. In this connection it is proper to state that in 1928 Oklahoma produced 566,000,000 gallons of natural gasoline valued at $30,000,000. Oklahoma gasoline, like Oklahoma crude oil, has to compete with tariff-free Venezuelan gasoline and Russian gasoline, the one produced by the cheap peon labor of South America and the other by the cheap peasant labor of Soviet Russia.

But that is only one point. Every property holder in Oklahoma is interested in the oil tariff issue, interested to the extent of a three and a half mills tax on his property. Until oil prices were forced down, no State ad valorem tax was levied. The gross-production tax made such a levy unnecessary, but, because there is no tariff on oil, Oklahoma is losing about $7,000,000 a year in gross-production tax, and the taxpayers have to make up that loss. And that is not all. Farmers of the State are losing millions of dollars in oil-lease money and money from royalties because there is no tariff on oil and gasoline. Tens of thousands of men in Oklahoma are out of employment who would be employed, were there a tariff on oil. They would not have been out of employment for the last two years had not Congress refused to give petroleum the tariff protection it gave to every dinky little manufactured product of New England, and neither would Oklahoma merchants have lost millions of dollars in business because of the shrinkage of the State's buying power directly due to oil industry conditions.

This isn't all of it, but it is enough to show that Oklahoma is vitally interested in the oil tariff issue. So is Texas; so is Kansas; so is every other State of the 20 oil-producting States.—Blackwell Tribune.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. FINLEY].

Mr. FINLEY. Mr. Chairman, I never know whether to be amused or amazed by the cheerful inconsistency of wet speakers, by the airy way in which they brush aside or ignore well-known facts, by their easy assumption that their hearers do not know that the argument they happen to be making has been confuted a thousand times, and by their utter refusal to accept the ultimate conclusions to which their arguments logically lead.

Somewhat of this was illustrated on yesterday by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DYER], an unsqueezed or an unwrung wet, in his remarks on this floor.

In the course of his remarks the gentleman plaintively lamented that Congress will not provide for a referendum and permit the people to vote upon the repeal or retention of the eighteenth amendment. I am sure the gentleman knows that every Member of this House knows that the people have voted on this very matter every two years since the eighteenth amendment was adopted. I am sure he knows that every Member of this House knows that each succeeding election has reduced the number of wets on this floor until the last, and in that election the people forgot everything but the clouds of business depression which covered the land. I am sure he knows that every Member of this House knows that Congress has no power to submit to popular vote a proposal to amend the Constitution of the United States; and I am sure that the gentleman knows that every Member of this House knows that such a referendum would settle nothing and decide nothing, for even if the drys should poll a majority of millions of votes, as they did in 1928 and as they certainly would, the wets would no more abide by that result than they have by the result of the 1928 election. Their noisy and well-financed agitation and propaganda would go right on.

In support of this I refer to the intemperance of the gentleman's own remarks, and in further support of it I quote from a speech delivered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. O'CONNOR], another unsqueezed or unwrung wet, on the floor of this House on June 3, 1930 (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, vol. 72, pt. 9, p. 9980, 71st Cong., 2d sess), dealing with this very matter, as follows:

Furthermore, let me say to the gentleman that no referendum whatever would bind me. I would not submit to any referendum on such a question if I was the only man left to vote for its repeal and everybody voted against it.

Surely one must either be amazed or amused that wets should beg for a referendum out of one corner of the mouth and frankly tell us out of the other corner that they have no intention or thought of abiding by it.

I do not question the gentleman's statement that the drys spent $50,000,000 to achieve the adoption of the eighteenth amendment. I only care to say that if they had spent twice $50,000,000 to achieve that result, it is the best investment ever made on this continent since our forefathers invested their lives, their fortunes, and their sacred honor to redeem us from a more respectable despotism than slavery to the liquor traffic. [Applause.]

Right in that connection, I want to file herewith and make a part of my remarks a statement that I filed with the Committee on Territories on the 9th of this month. This statement contains the names of contributors and contributions of more than $1,000 to the Association Against the Prohibition Amendment, one of the 35 or 40 organizations seeking the repeal of the eighteenth amendment and the Volstead Act. They were made in 1928 and 1929 and 1930. These names and figures are taken from the sworn statement by H. H. Curran before a subcommittee of the United States Senate.

FEBRUARY 9, 1932.

CHAIRMAN COMMITTEE ON TERRITORIES,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR SIR: Under leave granted me at the last meeting of the committee and for information of its members, I file herewith a list of contributors and contributions of more than $1,000 made to the Association Against the Eighteenth Amendment, one of the 35 or 40 organizations seeking repeal of the eighteenth amendment, during the years 1928, 1929, and 1930.

These names and figures were given by Mr. H. H. Curran, president of the Association Against the Eighteenth Amendment, before a subcommittee of the Judiciary Committee of the United States Senate conducting an investigation of activities of lobbying associations and lobbyists in and around Washington and appear on pages 4096–4098 of part 9 of the hearings before said subcommittee:

Respectfully,

CHAS. FINLEY.

Mr. MANLOVE. Who is this Mr. Curran?

Mr. FINLEY. He is president of the Association Against the Eighteenth Amendment.

Mr. CLANCY. Is it not true that some of these millionaires contributed originally in enormous sums for the passage or adoption of the eighteenth amendment?

Mr. FINLEY. I am not advised about that, but I am advised about this, that if the manufacture of beer, with a tax on beer, which the gentleman from Missouri has recommended, should be adopted, the income tax of these gentlemen would probably be reduced.

Mr. CLANCY. Is it not true that Sebastian S. Kresge, worth about $200,000,000, a 5-and-10-cent store magnate, contributed and raised by personal solicitation millions of dollars to put the eighteenth amendment into the Constitution? Did not the drys raise a lobbying pot of $70,000,000?

Mr. FINLEY. I am not aware of the contribution made by this gentleman. I want to say again that if he did invest, or if these gentlemen did invest, their money in that way, it is the greatest investment that the country has ever seen. [Applause.] If this gentleman, the proprietor of the 5-and-10-cent store, did invest his money in that way, he probably did it in order that the money that ordinarily would be spent for booze might come to his store and be put into those things to benefit the women and children. [Applause.]

Now I want to turn from that to other things.

Day before yesterday I happened to be before the Committee on Rules. Before that committee was another unsqueezed wet, and I say that without disrespect, only to indicate the degree of wetness of gentlemen. This gentleman was before the committee asking for a rule to consider a bill he had introduced to put more teeth into and further strengthen the antinarcotic law.

Here are some of the things he said. Narcotics are habit-forming. Well, so is alcohol. The narcotic habit is incurable. So, almost, is the liquor habit. Narcotics, he says, destroy character. Well, so does alcohol. Also he said that narcotics unfit addicts for the duties of life. So does alcohol. Narcotics make criminals of addicts. So does alcohol. That dope addicts make other dope addicts, he says. Well, so do alcohol addicts make other alcohol addicts.

Up to that point his argument and the arguments of the prohibitionists go hand in hand. He went on to criticize the administration of the antinarcotics law. Among other things, he said that worthy agents were dismissed from the service and unworthy agents retained. The same thing has been said by the wet Members of the prohibition law. He said that other officials refused to cooperate with the agents. That has been said by wets against the prohibition enforcement service and law. He said that officers of the law connive and conspire with drug rings. The same has been said against the prohibition law. He said that graft and corruption were rife in enforcement of the antinarcotics law. The same thing has been said about the prohibition law. He went farther and said that there are more drug addicts to-day than before the law was passed, that in days gone by the production of drugs was measured in ounces, and that now it is measured in tons. In other words, made the same old argument against the prohibition enforcement law, namely, that it is a failure. But by a strange twist, accepting the same premises as advocates of prohibition, making the same arguments, he gets himself to an entirely different conclusion. The same arguments that justify in his mind repeal of the prohibition law bring him to the conclusion that the antinarcotics law ought to be not only maintained but strengthened and more rigidly enforced. I submit there is a place where a man must be either amused or amazed, when by the same system of logic he comes to one conclusion in one case and arrives at the opposite conclusion in exactly the same kind of a case.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FINLEY. I am sorry that I have not the time.

Mr. BOYLAN. Just one question.

Mr. FINLEY. The gentleman will excuse me. There is not a man on the floor of the House, there is not a man who is a Member of this House, who can make an argument for the maintenance and enforcement of the narcotics law without at the same time and in the same words making an equally strong argument for the maintenance and enforcement of the prohibition law. It can not be done. They say against the prohibition law that it is unconstitutional.

If it is unconstitutional, then the antinarcotics law is unconstitutional. I have heard men on this floor who are ardent wets make most eloquent, most earnest pleas for the maintenance and rigid enforcement of the antinarcotics law. How can they make such an argument without at the same time repudiating some of the arguments they make in so far as the prohibition law is concerned? They say that prohibition is an invasion of State rights. What then is the antinarcotics law? What then is the Mann white slave law? What then is every quarantine law on the statute books of this country? And yet gentlemen are making arguments for the support of these laws. And by the same arguments they repudiate their own arguments against the eighteenth amendment.

I wish I had the time to point out all their inconsistencies. There is no argument made against prohibition by these wets which they will carry to its ultimate conclusion. They will not accept the inevitable and logical conclusion of their own arguments. For instance, it was said on the floor of the House some time ago that prohibition makes criminals of people. Criminals of whom? "Speak for yourself, John Alden." The prohibition law did not make a criminal of me. Everyone within the sound of my voice knows that no law, unless it is an ex post facto law, ever made a criminal of anybody. So I might go on, except for the limited time I have, and call attention to this argument, that argument, and the other. Just one instance more. They tell us that prohibition is making drunkards of our young people. The question is asked, Why? Then the pundit, the professor of psychology, shows himself, and says there is embedded in the young folks of the country a deep-seated purpose and determination to do the things that they are told they must not do. Let us see if our wet friends will carry that argument to its conclusion. Is the law that says thou shalt not commit adultery making strumpets of the girls of this country? If not, why not? They are told they must not do that. Is the law which says thou shalt not steal making thieves of our boys? If not, why not? Deep-seated in every one of them, we are told, is the determination to do that which they are forbidden to do. Take your arguments and carry them to their conclusions. There is not one that has been made within my hearing against prohibition whose ultimate and necessary conclusions will be accepted by the man who makes it.

This is, of course, too large a subject to be discussed within the 20 minutes at my disposal. I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and yield back the remainder of my time.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA].

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Mr. Chairman, when the Finance Reconstruction Corporation bill was before the House there was a tendency on the part of the gentleman in control to resist every amendment. It got so that in the latter part of the afternoon it was almost impossible to even properly explain an amendment. A condition of that kind does not happen very often in the House. I have seen it happen in my 14 years here when a committee is given a bill and told to put it through. All the wisdom of the world is not centered in any one department of the Government, and certainly it is not centered in the Federal Reserve Board. Surely, if the Federal Reserve Board had the vision and the genius some thought it had some time ago, perhaps Congress would not have been called upon to consider legislation of the far-reaching effect and the doubtful validity which has been presented to it and enacted into law.

The necessity and wisdom of some of the amendments which we offered will have to be acknowledged before very long. For instance, an important amendment that I happened to offer provided that bonds of small denominations, of $50 and $100, of this Reconstruction Finance Corporation should be offered for sale direct to the public. That was voted down. It was then said that it was not constructive. It was not economically sound. A New York banker did not offer it. But yesterday the same proposition was wisdom. It was announced that Government bonds would be offered in small denominations. It came from one of the "four minutemen" who are going to talk the country out of the depression. It is sound now; it is constructive; and the Government securities will be offered in small denominations direct to the people. I only hope that when bonds of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation are offered for sale, and which will bear a higher rate of interest than the present Government bonds, that the same practice will be followed.

I reserve the right to call attention to these amendments which I offered from time to time as occasion arises. This law has been in effect but a very few days. One amendment was adopted by the House, and it was offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN]. He got one in, and I think I got one in, and there was an inclination to even oppose the Rayburn amendment. It stated that it was not necessary. Who, in these times, would think of doing such a thing? Let me read you the Rayburn amendment. It is very simple:

> That no fee or commission shall be paid by any applicant for a loan under the provisions hereof in connection with any such application or any loan made or to be made herein, and the agreement to pay or payment of any such fee or commission shall be unlawful.

That amendment was adopted. Oh, it was not necessary, we were told, but fortunately it is in the bill. I had prepared a similar amendment. The gentleman from Texas was kind enough to confer with me about it. He offered the amendment and it was adopted.

I want to impress upon the House the necessity of considering amendments that are offered, and not to howl down and laugh down and ridicule every time an attempt is made to make any suggestion to perfect a bill.

The gentleman from California [Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT] is one of the best-equipped Members of this House, always informed. He discovered the first attempted violation of the Rayburn amendment. The act was approved on January 22, 1932. Within 20 days after the approval of that act offers were made to obtain loans from the Reconstruction Finance Corporation on a commission basis. Again I congratulate the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] in succeeding in having the House approve that amendment.

The gentleman from California [Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT] received from one of his constituents, the Sierra Valley Bank, Loyalton, Sierra County, Calif., this startling letter:

FIRST MORTGAGE LOAN CO.,
San Francisco, Calif., February 12, 1932.

SIERRA VALLEY BANK,
Loyalton, Sierra County, Calif.

GENTLEMEN: We have made arrangements with the management here to submit applications for loans to the newly formed Hoover Reconstruction Finance Corporation. It occurs to us that you might like to secure a loan from that corporation to take care of possible frozen assets or for other purposes, and we offer you our services to that end. The loans will bear 5½ per cent interest, will run for six months, and the management here states that the note can no doubt be renewed for another six months or increased or diminished at that time if conditions justify.

Our charge for the service would be one-half per cent of the amount of the loan secured. That is, we would charge $500 for securing a loan for you of $100,000. Other size loans in proportion. If you are interested, we will be glad to hear from you.

Yours very sincerely,

SHERRARD BONNER, President.

Now, Sherrard Bonner must have had some justification for sending out that letter, offering loans to banks in the name of this corporation, after having "made arrangements with the management in California," to take over their frozen assets, or for other purposes, at the rate of one-half per cent of the amount loaned, and this was the "know-all corporation" that was going to bring the country out of the depression.

Mr. MANLOVE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I yield.

Mr. MANLOVE. If I had received that letter and felt that there had been any doubtful attitude on the part of the officers of the Finance Corporation, I would have gone down to their offices and put it in their faces and asked them if they had granted any authority for any company or any individual to make loans and deduct a fee for the service. I wonder if that action has been taken?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I can assure the gentleman from Missouri that any time the gentleman from California [Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT] has anything like that, he will deal with it in a constructive way. The gentleman from California [Mr. ENGLEBRIGHT] has already done so. It is the gentleman from New York who is bringing the matter to the attention of the House. I intend to keep on coming here and exposing anything which may come to my attention which is contrary to law or defeating the intent of Congress.

Mr. MANLOVE. I want to say to the gentleman from New York that two of the most outstanding gentlemen in the United States are members of that board, men whose integrity has never been doubted by any American citizen, the Secretary of Agriculture, and also Mr. Bestor, and I think it would be entirely proper for any Member of this House who receives a letter of that kind to go to the officials of that corporation and present it to them.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. Of course. It has been done in this case. But I hope that the injunction that was put upon the House a few days ago when we discussed the Glass-Steagall bill, for the inflation of paper money, "Hush, hush. Don't discuss it. Don't say anything about it," will be remembered. The gentleman from Maryland then took the floor and gave the House some of the so-called secret information, and I do not know that anything serious has happened since then. But there seems to be an inclination on the part of some that legislation must not be openly discussed, conditions can not even be mentioned in public, and criticism is immediately branded. Why can we not criticize the Reconstruction Finance Corporation?

In the discussion the other day on the bill some gentleman mentioned that $2,000,000 had already been loaned to a railroad to pay interest. The next day the papers carried the item that it was $7,000,000. I sincerely hope the very splendid gentlemen whom the gentleman from Missouri mentioned will take hold and will use the enormous resources at their disposal to do something which will bring relief to industry and business.

Gentlemen have a right to be interested in frozen assets, but my concern just now are the people who are freezing and the people who are hungry. Just go into New York City and go into the gentleman's State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. BRUMM. There are no starving people there, my friend.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BRUMM] states there are no starving people in Pennsylvania.

Mr. BRUMM. I did not say Pennsylvania. I said in my section. We take care of our own poor.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that it is highly improper for a colloquy to take place on the floor with a Member sitting in his seat. I think the rules of the House in that respect should be enforced.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I thank the gentleman from Alabama. Ordinarily I would have ignored the interruption, but any Member who desires to state that there is no hunger, that there is no suffering in his district, I want the RECORD to show it, whether he is sitting, whether he is lying down, or whether he is shouting it from the cloakroom. I want the RECORD to show it, because there is very serious want in every district in this country.

Mr. BRUMM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. No.

Mr. BRUMM. I want to say I did not say that, and the gentleman knows I did not say it. I said there are no starving people up there.

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I will yield for any statement the gentleman desires to make, because to me if people are in need it is not a matter of personal privilege, it is not a joke, but it is a very serious matter.

Mr. GIFFORD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LAGUARDIA. I can not yield now. I believe that this Congress, which has given so much consideration to the creation of credit and to the rehabilitation of financial institutions, ought to do something immediately in the way of direct relief for the people who are in need and who need rehabilitation. I do not care what method is followed.

I do not care whether the money is given to the States or directly to the individuals, but as for one I can not sit here idly day after day and permit this real condition, this real serious condition, to remain ignored.

Gentlemen, there might have been some sound constitutional questions interposed against the direct relief given in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act, but since the passage of that act there can no longer be any constitutional objection raised about the power of Congress to appropriate money for the purpose of making loans to States or to appropriate money to protect the public health in the way of direct relief to the needy.

Can any constitutional lawyer justify the distinction that was made on the floor only day before yesterday, when the Jones agricultural bill was before the House, that it was unconstitutional because provision was therein made to make loans to individuals but that the making of loans to corporations, as provided in the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act, is constitutional? I can not subscribe to any such school of thought.

The emergency is such that perhaps Congress is justified in straining its powers, as it certainly did in the enactment of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill, but surely we should not stop there, and I believe Congress will find it necessary in the very immediate future to pass the necessary legislation which will provide sufficient appropriations to relieve the want which exists throughout the country. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from New York [Mr. BOYLAN].

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Chairman, it pained me exceedingly to sit here and listen a few minutes ago to a gentleman from the historic State of Kentucky speak on prohibition. My mind went back to other days when that splendid State was noted for three things—its beautiful women, its fast horses, and its good whisky. I thought of the shades of those Kentuckians who had been gathered to their rest, many of them distinguished citizens in all walks of life. Perhaps some of them might have been moonshiners, but to their credit they turned out an excellent product.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOYLAN. I regret time will not permit me.

However, I thought what the shades of those illustrious ancestors of his would have said if they had been able through the spirit world to listen to his talk here to-day.

However, I did not rise for the purpose of making a prohibition speech. I want to propose something really constructive to you. We hear so much talk about the depression and what Congress should do and what Congress is doing and what Congress is not doing. I have a plan. I do not say it is the only plan, but it is a plan that will create jobs, and that is what we want to-day—we want jobs. Our people do not want platitudes, they do not want a dole, they want work, and the bill that I have introduced will provide work.

A short time ago I introduced a bill providing that all Federal employees be granted a 5-day week and a 6-hour day. If we put this into operation at once, we will immediately increase the jobs in the Federal service at least one-third. There would be an approximate increase of over 200,000. It would be the beginning of a short week and a short day. I think the most effective single proposal that could be put into effect at the present time is to make this 5-day week universal.

At the present time in our large industrial centers, New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, Boston, San Francisco, St. Louis, and New Orleans, there is little or no work done by office staffs on Saturday. In New York no large mercantile or office establishment does any work on Saturday. So therefore by the Government adopting this plan we would simply go into a field that has already been entered by others in commercial and industrial life.

Now, you may say it is going to cost something. Well, of course, every thing costs. I remember in the New York State Legislature we had to fight for years to get an 8-hour day for industry, but we got it and now it is practically universal. While to-day it may be in the advance period to speak of a 6-hour day, yet just as sure as we are sitting here, a 6-hour day and a 5-day week will come.

In industries that find continuous production most economical, shifts could be more frequent so as to absorb more of the unemployed. Hours of work could be adjusted as productivity increases.

There is no discipline in industrial work that can not be got from other kinds of work. Its distinctive contribution is the income which is essential.

Under our organization of society man's work properly extends beyond the industrial field into relationships as a citizen and as a member of a community. Shorter hours of work will make possible a broader and fuller life for workers as well as a method of relieving unemployment. The 5-day week would cheer us in our present emergency and would provide a stable basis for industry as the depression recedes.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOYLAN. I yield.

Mr. McCORMACK. Has the gentleman given any consideration to the effect of the substitution of machinery for human labor and can the gentleman give us any approximate idea as to the number of human beings, if any, that have been displaced as a result of machinery performing their work.

Mr. BOYLAN. Well, I have not the numbers, but we all know from our studies along these lines that hundreds of thousands of workers have been displaced through the use of machines in industry.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield further?

Mr. BOYLAN. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. Is not the real demand or the real necessity for the 5-day work week the fact that hundreds of thousands of employees have been displaced as a result of machinery being substituted for their labor, and that a 5-day work week is reasonably necessary as a means of regulating the unrestricted and unlimited use of machinery or the abuse of the use of machinery?

Mr. BOYLAN. Yes. I agree with the gentleman in toto on that particular angle of the situation.

The Federal Government is an important employer. Enlisted in our Civil Service are approximately 700,000 workers; about 70,000 of them are in the District of Columbia, and 630,000 outside. The Federal Government has a responsibility to set up the highest standards for those who do its work.

This is the point I have always made during my service here. In every line we ought to set up the highest standards. We ought to have the most beautiful buildings in the entire United States right here in the District of Columbia. We should have the most magnificent parks and parkways, the most splendid street development. Why? In order that visiting citizens from other States and cities could see what we have here and go back to their own State or town and endeavor to emulate it.

The office forces, as I have said, in practically all efficient, progressive offices to-day work upon a 5-day-week basis and have found it practical and efficient. When private business operates on this standard, it creates difficulties for the work of any group that is out of step.

Employees of the Government are asking for a 5-day week. That request should be granted, and in addition the Government should be in the forefront of progress.

In this period of unparalleled suffering from unemployment, shorter hours of work are the first step in the finding of jobs for the unemployed. The Federal Government should establish the 5-day week for its own employees as a preliminary to urging a similar measure on private industry. The result would be increased efficiency, manifest in greater production per person, and employment for the unemployed.

Employment is the only constructive solution for the unemployment problem. Our Federal Government should do its full share by taking the leadership through example to others.

There is no doubt in my mind that we have reached the point in our development where, as a matter of justice and right, we should institute a 5-day week for all the working people. Unless this readjustment is made, and made speedily, these unemployment cycles will return more frequently. Why the Federal employees, serving the greatest Government on earth, should be required to work more than five days a week is beyond my understanding.

Working people are entitled to enjoyment of the leisure brought about by a lesser number of working hours. Every kind of work where the service is continuous becomes monotonous and the effect of this is neither beneficial to the worker nor society.

Efficiency comes with short hours. Workers give as much service in a shorter working week as they did in the longer week.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOYLAN. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. I am sure the gentleman wants us to go along with him. If he will propose a measure that will put every adult man and woman in the United States on the Government pay roll, at a salary, say, of $5,000 a year, and provide work for them at six hours a day and five days a week, I will vote for it. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOYLAN. The gentleman, whom I honor and esteem, is highly facetious. Of course, he has a keen sense of humor, which I appreciate.

In answering my colleague from Texas, I will say that while it would not be possible to put everybody on the pay roll, as long as we have a dollar in the United States Treasury we ought to let no one go hungry or without shelter or without clothing.

Mr. BLANTON. I agree with the gentleman that no one willing to work should go hungry, but I was thinking it would be unjust to let some work at good salaries at 6 hours a day for 5 days a week and let others work 18 hours a day 7 days in a week at poor wages to make up for it.

Mr. BOYLAN. That would not be necessary—just as the 8-hour day is universal, so would six hours a day and five days a week become universal. All these inequalities would be ironed out, because if the Federal Government adopted it, industrial organizations would follow and shorter hours would be gradually adopted; the process would be progressive, until all workers would enjoy its benefits.

Human beings have a right to live free, full lives, and to develop their cultural side, so that the beautiful things of life may be enjoyed. If given time to enjoy spiritual things, we will be better men and women, a better community, and a better Nation.

Another reason is consumption. Greater consumption will follow, because of more time to use things, and if we make greater use of those things which can be bought, the whole structure of society will be benefited. We must prepare to take care of the unemployment situation. The 6-hour day and the 5-day week will help take care of it.

On account of the great economic stress we should make these readjustments.

The Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen have made an issue of this question. Their leaders believe that the adoption of the 5-day week and the 6-hour day will start a movement which will revitalize consuming power and the Nation's industries and that relief can only come in this manner.

To give new life to mass consumption it will be necessary to put every worker to work at a wage which will give him an income sufficient to purchase from the flow of goods which our production system has been geared to produce and which has been dammed up for nearly two years by an almost unbelievable concentration of wealth which has made it impossible for millions of our citizens to buy even the barest necessities of life.

If this mass-consuming power is not restored, capital as well as labor must remain idle and continue to be unable to produce the many human needs and comforts which the brain of man has taught us are available to all mankind.

Neither capital nor labor prefers to remain idle, but to the selfish and narrow desire of a small few to shield and even to increase this concentrated wealth neither capital nor labor is permitted to carry out its beneficent aims.

The introduction of shorter hours would place millions of men and women at work, and the increase in their total purchasing power would prove a nation-wide benefit.

The conditions from which the workers, business, and industry are now suffering constitute a most serious indictment against our industrial leaders. While there were being developed methods and machinery by which one worker would produce as much as many who had been previously employed, those who control industry resisted reduction of the work day and the work week. Their failure to recognize the simplest and most obvious economic truth is largely responsible for the present condition of depression, bankruptcy, and unemployment.

Now that all elements are confronted with a condition, the seriousness of which but few recognize, the agencies through which the necessary remedies might be applied are lacking.

It must be realized that criticism will not solve our problem. It is apparent that machines are "producers," but they have not the ability to purchase and consume that which is produced. The people are the consumers and a vast majority are workers, who can consume that which they can buy with the wages for which they can sell their labor.

Through the development and use of machines in almost every line of production one worker engaged eight hours per day six days per week will produce more than two workers could under methods previously used. In the domestic and export market it is not possible to dispose of that which is produced by the more than 40,000,000 wage earners working a full week. As a consequence, with their machines and modern methods it requires the services of but one-half the number of workers to produce the same quantity as was formerly produced by all those engaged in the industries.

Some of those displaced by machines have been absorbed by newly developed lines of industry. Those who could not be absorbed have involuntarily enlisted in the army of unemployed. Not being able to sell their labor, they were unable to buy and consume that which was being produced by their more fortunate brothers and the machines they operated. This resulted in reducing the "domestic demand" upon which the prosperity of the Nation rested. Because of the inability of those displaced to buy, other industries were unable to sell and discontinued or curtailed operations. This added more workers to the number of the unemployed and continued the operation of the vicious circle which has brought loss of profit or bankruptcy to the investor, hard times to management, and hunger, misery, and suffering to the unemployed millions and their dependents.

Conferences have been held under Federal, State, and municipal direction to deal with the problem. Officials of high and low degree have discussed and deplored the condition. But few have had the courage to deal with the question in other than generalities and fewer have expressed a willingness to apply the only remedy which will permanently improve the condition.

In the practice of our democracy, the control of industry has remained autocratic. Not even the Federal Government can require our industrial captains to do the one thing that will substitute prosperity for bankruptcy. The head of each industry ignores the situation, or suggests that some other line should first apply the remedy. Apparently it does not occur to them that the cooperative system as practiced in America is facing its severest test. They refuse to recognize that American ideals and institutions are on trial. Fortified by accumulated profits, they await the return of prosperity. They say that we have suffered panics in the past, and in due time prosperity returned.

But what about the unemployed husband and father who is willing to work but unable to sell his labor for money with which to buy bread? What must he think as he walks the streets half fed and poorly clad? How long will he and the other unemployed remain true to American ideals and be satisfied with industrial liberty as now practiced? Winter and unemployment mean suffering from cold and hunger to those willing to work but unable to find it. In this richest nation in the world, where there is no question about the ability of industry to meet the needs of all, are we not justified in asking, Are business and industry serving the people or have they become the master of our workers?

The remedy is apparent. In order to meet immediate need, governments, corporations, and individuals should create every job possible. Employment should be extended to the greatest number of workers by the adoption of the 6-hour day and the 5-day week. If industry were organized on a 5-day-week basis, it would give employment to at least 20 per cent additional workers.

Many employers who recognize the seriousness and danger of the present situation have declared "the only way to remedy the present depression is to provide work for the unemployed, and the best and most expeditious way to do this is for our employers to accept the 5-day week."

There is no problem of greater importance or more dangerous to established order than unemployment when it affects millions of citizens of a nation.

The solution of this grave problem is the immediate inauguration of the 5-day-week schedule in business and industry. If this change were made, it would immediately create a new buying power that would quickly cause new life in every field of human endeavor and speedily turn the wheels of industry to inaugurate a new era of prosperity for our people. [Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. Mr. Chairman, as a new Member of Congress, I have greatly enjoyed its deliberative sessions.

There never have been more serious questions, so difficult of solution, questions so pregnant with responsibility and fraught with such grave concern to the future weal of the country, presented to any Congress than those presented to this Congress.

When Congress convened last December, the entire Nation was standing in the abysmal and murky depths of the worst depression and panic the country had ever experienced. The President, bewildered, hesitating, fearful, and uncertain as to the course to pursue, had stood for 13 months and refused to call Congress into special session so that it could endeavor to relieve the distress of the Nation and bring some semblance of order out of the veritable chaos into which the business of the Nation had been plunged. This unwarranted delay increased unemployment, further depressed the prices of farm products, and caused the failure of thousands of our banks and mercantile establishments.

In 1928, in a public address, Mr. Hoover said, "The poorhouse is vanishing from among us. Given a chance to go forward with the policies of the last eight years, we shall be in sight of the day when poverty will be banished from the Nation."

The "great engineer" has had his chance. After three years of his administration of the Government, instead of the millennium which he promised the grim and foreboding specter of poverty is stalking up and down through our land. Sixty millions of our citizens depending upon the farms and the factories for support are in dire distress and despair, and thousands of our banks and mercantile establishments have been forced into involuntary liquidation.

The President in his palatial quarters on Pennsylvania Avenue and his advisers either are not concerned about or do not really know the actual distress of the American people.

Mrs. Dolly Gann, sister of Vice President Curtis, during a recent tour in the interest of the candidacy of President Hoover, according to the public press made the following statement:

> As a result of constructive measures President Hoover has taken, the great mass of the people have never discovered that they were in hard times.

Again, on February 4, 1932, in an address before the Republican Women's Club of Chicago, Mrs. Gann, in her remarks preliminary to the indorsement of Mr. Hoover for reelection, according to the Associated Press, predicted that the Democrats would take the Republicans to task for the depression, but added the following:

> The opposition will certainly find it difficult to make an issue out of a condition that no longer exists.

In glittering generalities, adorned with roseate hues, Mr. Hoover promises prosperity. Appreciating only the theories of government, he yet would in some magic way delude the citizenry as to real conditions by the application of some mystic mental therapeutics instead of endeavoring to remove the cause of distress. He would convince the man who says he is hungry that he is mistaken and suffering only from some mental aberration. In confidence he repetitiously states that "prosperity is just around the corner," but fails to advise that such corner lies only within the White House walls.

On May 1, 1930, Mr. Hoover, referring to the terrible depression, said, "We have now passed the worst."

On October 2, 1930, still feeling that the depression was only a mental disease, he said, "The depression is but a temporary halt."

Finally, on December 8, 1931, with hungry men, women, and little children petitioning for aid, Mr. Hoover in his message to Congress, said, "We find fundamental national gains. There has been a distinct gain in public health."

I would that Mr. Hoover and his advisers would go with me and see the pinched, hungry, and cold faces of the millions of good women and little children in our land who are facing stark want and starvation. I wish they could see the millions of honest but unemployed laborers in our land, with fear and despair in their hearts as they realize they can not prevent the suffering of their loved ones. I wish they could see the pathos and tragedy resting upon millions of our farmers and business men who have seen their homes taken from them. I wish they could see these and the countless thousands of other tragedies caused by this depression, and they would realize that the people had discovered that they are enduring hard times. I say to you, these are the people and the conditions about which I am deeply concerned.

In 1930 in America there were 1,300 bank failures and 26,000 commercial failures. In 1931 there were 2,200 bank failures. The American factories have been closed or they have greatly reduced the number of their employees. Eight million American laborers are out of employment. The American farmer is selling his products at a price far below the cost of production, causing ruin to 30,000,000 of our citizens who are engaged in agriculture. In 1931 wheat sold at the lowest price ever recorded in the grain market, corn sold lower than it had sold since 1900, and hogs lower than they had sold since 1906. Farm income for 1931 was $6,000,000,000 less than in 1910. Farm values have declined 66⅔ per cent, and as a result of this great loss thousands of farmers have had their homes taken from them in their old age. The clutching hand of fear has a strangle hold on the vitals of all business.

In an effort to avoid responsibility for the present panic Mr. Hoover says that it is the result of a world-wide economic condition. This is not true. While there were 2,200 bank failures in the United States in 1931, our neighbor—Canada—did not have any bank failures. The American farmer sold his wheat in 1931 for 30 cents per bushel, but the farmer of France received $1.82 per bushel for his wheat, the farmer of Germany $1.50 per bushel, and the farmer of Italy $1.60 per bushel.

It would not, of course, be asserted that Mr. Hoover is wholly responsible for the present panic, but it is true that the acts of the administration or its failure to act tended to cause or increase the magnitude of the present depression. While there are others, the following specific acts or failures to act on the part of the administration contributed to cause the present economic crisis and panic:

First. The crash of the stock market in 1929 was the beginning of the panic. Mr. Hoover and his Cabinet should have known that the economic foundation of the country was at the very brink of the precipice. They should have cautioned the public against the mad orgy of wild speculations then obtaining. Yet, in the face of impending disaster and until the very day of its appearance, the administration and its advisers daily proclaimed that the Nation was more prosperous than ever before and that such prosperity would remain. Without a word of caution, but with erroneous reports as to the true condition, the public was urged to further excesses in their investments. The public, too late, realized the falsity of the "blue-sky" statements on which it had relied.

Second. One of the most emphatic contributions to the present depression was the enactment of the present tariff law, which resulted in retaliatory tariffs by the foreign countries. These tariffs completely closed the markets of the world to our products and destroyed our industries. This closed many of our factories and threw thousands of laborers out of employment.

Third. The action of the Farm Board in depressing the price of farm products, and especially in refusing to keep its wheat from competing with the 1931 wheat crop, brought ruin upon the American farmers.

Fourth. The administration failed to use its influence to cause the Federal reserve bank to exercise its authority so far as possible to produce a reasonable inflation in commodity prices at a time when such inflation would have prevented thousands of bank failures. While the ability of such bank in such matter doubtless was limited, through liberalization of discount rates certain relief would have come.

Fifth. The administration negligently failed to warn the public against excessive investments in foreign securities, although through its departments it should have known of such investments. In fact, in an investigation by a recent Senate committee in regard to foreign loans, the revelations of the exchange of communication between the representatives of the Government of Colombia and the National City Bank force the conclusion that a loan of $4,000,000 was made to Colombia only on the condition that certain valuable oil concessions be restored to the Mellon-owned Gulf Oil Co. Mr. Mellon resigned as Secretary of the Treasury and there will be no further investigation of the charges made against him in the resolution presented to Congress.

Billions of dollars thus invested in foreign loans have been withdrawn from circulation in the United States, gravely increasing the force of the present depression.

Sixth. The special favors granted at the insistence of the President to the international bankers and the foreign countries in the postponement of the payments on foreign debts withdrew from circulation in the United States more than one-fourth of a billion of dollars.

Seventh. In the expensive bureaucratic administration of the Government the present administration has caused a governmental deficit of two and one-fourth billions of dollars, which it proposes to meet by the imposition of obnoxious taxes upon the people. This has greatly contributed to cause the present depression.

Eighth. The President for 13 months hesitated and negligently refused to call Congress into special session so that legislation might be enacted to relieve the distress of the Nation. No excuse can be offered for this unwarranted delay.

The tragedy of the hour is that the administration will not permit the appeals of the countless millions of our people who are in dire distress to reach the inner circles of the Government.

The administration, by its lack of knowledge of true conditions, its unreasoning internationalism, and its desire to help the great monopolies, is blinded as to the real distress and need of the average American citizen and business man. It hears only the voice of predatory wealth, but is deaf to the pleadings of the common man.

The administration has been weighed in the balance and found wanting. The people next November will select another pilot, who will lead them out of the present wilderness into the dawn of a new day.

While I speak only my personal views, I desire to say that I am pursuaded that the distress in our land to-day has been caused by the administration of the affairs of the Government too much in the interests of the great monopolies and the specially favored class, rather than in the interests of the great mass of the people.

Under the policies of the Government in the enactment of the present indefensible tariff law, containing the most prohibitive tariff schedules ever visited upon any people, solely for the benefit of the great monopolies, the markets of the world have been closed to our farm and manufactured products. While this tariff law caused the American consumers to pour a steady stream of their earnings into the swollen coffers of the tariff barons, it ruined the American farmers and business men, closed our factories and threw millions of our laborers out of employment.

Although I and a few others voted against the moratorium, Congress, at the solicitation of the President, granted a moratorium in the payment of foreign debts. Such action was the first step in the cancellation of foreign debts, in order to aid the international bankers and the foreign countries so that such foreign countries might use this money to build armaments of war and saddle the payment thereof upon the already overburdened shoulders of the American taxpayers.

COST OF GOVERNMENT UNDER THE PRESENT ADMINISTRATION

The President advises us that under his administration of the Nation's business, we are facing a governmental deficit of approximately two and one-fourth billions of dollars for this fiscal year. Unmindful of the interest of the average citizen and business man, the administration proposes to meet this deficit by the levy of sales, document, and nuisance taxes upon the people. This would mean that the man of meager means would be compelled to pay as much as the man of great wealth.

The President, through his spokesman, further recommends that the revenue measure be made retroactive in its operations. Such ill-advised proposal, if enacted into law, would disturb the business planning of every citizen who had planned his business under the law then in force so that he could meet his obligations. The man who has set aside definite sums to meet obligations incurred would be told by the administration proposal that he could not use such funds for the purposes intended, but that by a retroactive law the Government was going to reach back and appropriate these funds for the payment of the expenses of the Government.

Personally, I shall not, and I believe Congress will not, support the President in this proposal.

For my part, I want to say that I am opposed to the sales, document, and nuisance taxes proposed by the administration, and to any retroactive tax law. The imposition of such taxes would not only place an unfair burden upon the average citizen but would also stifle the return of business prosperity.

A general sales tax would cause the amount of such tax, if perhaps not more, to be added to the price of every article purchased. Every time a pair of shoes, a pair of overalls, a gingham dress, or any other article is purchased the purchaser would be required to pay a tax upon such article purchased. It would be probable that the man who earns his daily bread by the sweat of his brow, by virtue of the very nature of his hard work, might be required to purchase a greater amount of shoes than a millionaire whose shoes touched only carpeted floors. In that case the laborer would be compelled to pay a larger tax than such millionaire, notwithstanding the millionaire concededly had received much greater benefits from the Government than the laborer. Under a general sales tax one would be compelled to pay tribute first for the swaddling clothes within which he was wrapped when he first nestled in the protecting arms of his mother, next for the raiment which protected him from the elements while he was struggling along in the battles of life, and finally when the working tools of life have fallen from his nerveless grasp, a tribute would be levied upon the shroud which inclosed his lifeless remains.

It has been urged by the proponents of a general sales tax that such tax would be paid by the consumer without his knowing that he was paying the tax. This specious argument would seem to be that it is proper to impose upon the people so long as we act in secret and do not let them know our acts.

I want to say to you that I do not subscribe to that vicious and pernicious argument. A public office is a public trust and as representatives of the people it is our sacred duty to labor diligently for those measures alone which will bring the greatest benefit to the people and always permit the light of public opinion to shine upon our every official act. [Applause.]

Frankly I say to you that there has been already too much invisible influence affecting the policies of our National Government. For my part I say we must destroy and remove that influence and place in its stead the voice of the people. [Applause.]

Personally, I should like to see included in the revenue measure a provision levying a tax of 75 per cent on all incomes received from sources and investments outside of the United States and its possessions. It has been estimated that many thousands of corporations in our country, in order to escape the effect of the retaliatory tariff laws enacted by foreign countries because of our tariff law, have organized branch or main corporations in such foreign countries, and are there manufacturing their products with foreign labor to supply the foreign markets of the world, markets formerly supplied by the products of American factories which employed American laborers, thus throwing millions of American laborers out of employment. If this high income tax rate is imposed, it will cause these corporations to invest this money which they have accumulated from the profits guaranteed them under the American tariff in the United States, and thus give employment to American laborers.

I should also recommend a provision in the revenue measure levying a high tax upon all chain stores. Unless some method is adopted to limit this octopus, it soon will have a strangle hold upon the business of the Nation and the people and will destroy all local and independent business.

The revenue measure should increase the income tax upon large incomes. Certainly, those who have been permitted to earn large incomes under our Government owe a much greater responsibility for the maintenance of such Government than those who have been permitted to earn a bare sustenance. Such tax should be graduated according to the benefits thus bestowed by the Government.

I say to you, Members of Congress, that there is no justification for the present enormous governmental deficit which necessitates the increase of the tax burdens of the people. Such deficit is solely the result of a mad orgy of wild spending of the people's money by those having charge of the Government. [Applause.]

Under the present and recent administrations the cost of government has mounted steadily. The cost to the American taxpayer of the present bureaucratic government has become so burdensome that it is unbearable. The people are aroused and justly demand that this burden be lessened. Useless and extravagant bureaus, which have accomplished nothing but the expenditure of public funds, must be abolished. There must be a consolidation of departments to prevent the ever-present overlapping and duplication of activities. This can and must be done without the impairment of the public service.

The need of the hour is a wise reduction of the cost of government rather than an increase of tax burdens.

A comparison of certain items of expenditure of public funds by the Sixty-seventh Congress in 1923 and the Sixty-eighth Congress in 1925, with appropriations made by Congress under the present administration for 1931, for the same items, reveals a vast increase in the cost of government. I submit the following as a fair example of such increase:

Executive Office

(a) Salaries to the Secretary of the President and personal services in the office of the President:
Sixty-seventh Congress	$74,280
Appropriations, 1931	126,120
Increase	51,840
(b) Contingent expenses of President, including stationery, etc.:
Sixty-seventh Congress	36,000
Appropriations, 1931	43,500
Increase	7,500
(c) Salaries of White House police:
Sixty-seventh Congress	55,540
Appropriations, 1931	103,200
Increase	47,660

Department of Commerce

(a) Salaries and other personal services in the District of Columbia:
Sixty-seventh Congress	201,250
Appropriations, 1931	348,095
Increase	146,845

Department of Agriculture

(a) Salaries and personal service in the District of Columbia:
Sixty-seventh Congress	472,520
Appropriations, 1931	736,000
Increase	263,480
(b) Miscellaneous expenses:
Sixty-seventh Congress	156,000
Appropriations, 1931	198,000
Increase	42,000

Under the last Congress of President Wilson's administration the total appropriation for the Department of Agriculture amounted to $31,475,386, but under the present administration, in 1931, the Department of Agriculture received appropriations in the total sum of $220,288,164, an increase of $188,812,796. The farmer has received no practical benefit from this enormous increase, for he is now receiving only about one-fourth as much for his products as he received under the Wilson administration.

The following is a comparison between certain appropriations for the years 1925 and 1931:

	1925	1931	Increase
Legislative Establishment	$14,648,136	$29,520,710	$14,872,574
Independent Offices	411,216,020	1,169,249,797	758,033,777
Department of Commerce	24,123,472	61,300,936	37,177,464
Department of Justice	24,277,141	42,247,989	18,020,848
Department of State	15,246,097	18,778,462	3,532,365
Department of the Treasury	269,354,848	372,556,973	103,202,125

The total appropriations by Congress for 1931 for the various national governmental organization units, exclusive of appropriations for interest on the public debt and sinking fund and other public debt retirements, amounted to $4,129,015,062.95. It has been estimated if the cost of local and State governments be added it would make a total of more than $12,000,000,000 which the people are compelled to pay to support the various arms of the Government. That means that the per capita expenditure for governmental expenses in 1931 was $100 for each of our 120,000,000 of people, or $400 for each average American family.

It is thus seen that the sum of $380 was expended by the American people during every second, night and day, in 1931 for the purpose of maintaining and supporting government.

The fact is that our administrators of the Government have ruthlessly and unnecessarily expended the people's money. In the last four decades our population has increased 100 per cent, the national wealth has increased 450 per cent, but the cost of government has increased 1,000 per cent.

When the new Department of Commerce Building was constructed, without reason or justification, the Government provided a private elevator for the exclusive use of the Secretary of Commerce to keep him from coming into contact with the people. The public is now paying for a girl to operate, and a guard to protect, this private elevator. It has been stated that this building contains 12 bronze doors, which cost $5,000 each, or a total of $60,000. There are 60,000,000 of people in our land, each of whom is worth less than the cost of one of these doors. I say to you, ladies and gentlemen of the Congress, the people are justly aroused, and they will not longer stand this unjustifiable expenditure of their money. [Applause.]

Thus the reason of the present deficit and the necessary tax increase is explained by the enormous increase of the cost of government under the present administration.

In an effort to relieve the tax burdens of the people caused by the expense of government the Democrats have in the three appropriation bills which have been passed by this Congress reduced the amount sought by the administration approximately $30,000,000, and they certainly will effect greater savings to the people in the other large appropriation bills yet to be presented.

In my judgment the only legislation which has been passed by this Congress which will bring any measure of relief to the present distress of the people is the Glass-Steagall bill recently passed by Congress. This bill liberalizes the discount privileges of the Federal reserve bank act and at once authorizes the Government to put in circulation $1,000,000,000 of new currency to circulate among the people. This certainly will cause a reasonable inflation and bring relief to every person in our land. I was glad to support this measure, for I believe it will bring relief to all the people and not alone to the great international bankers or other specially privileged groups. The Democrats have advocated the principle of this measure for 10 years and the Republicans have opposed such principle. The administration will have to answer to the citizenry for its failure to convene Congress 14 months earlier so that it might then enact this beneficial and remedial legislation. [Applause.]

Under the policies of the present administration our farmers and the average business man have been forced into utter ruin and bankruptcy. To-day 8,000,000 of honest laborers, with 25,000,000 good women and little children depending upon them for support, are out of work through no fault of their own. In our land of wealth and plenty they are walking up and down our streets with fear in their hearts seeking just enough work to keep cold and hunger from their loved ones. Yet, when they and the farmer seek relief, the administration, which gave a dole to the international bankers and the foreign countries, denies their appeal.

These are American and human needs. For my part, when human rights are on one side of the balance and material rights on the other side, I shall always be found on the side of human rights. I think the time has come when we should for a time forget the international bankers and the foreign countries and enact legislation which will bring actual and speedy relief to our distressed farmers, the average business man, and the millions of unemployed laborers in our land.

The Nation must not permit innocent children to suffer. [Applause.]

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. BRUMM.

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Chairman, and members of the committee, I have been trying for almost two weeks to get some time to speak on a subject that I think is important. It is at least to me in my district, and I think, ought to be important to everyone here. Before I do that, however, let me first correct my friend from New York [Mr. LAGUARDIA] in an error which he made, which is quite characteristic, in making a reference to me as I sat in my seat in the House. In his most intent and unwarrantably excited way, with often emphasis on the wrong place, he spoke about the "freezing people." It is a matter of everyday comment that this winter has been so mild that swimming pools have been opened where the ice usually forms, and in my district in the middle of January I read in one of the local papers that at one of the ice ponds, where usually 18 inches of ice forms, the boys went swimming. When he made that ridiculous statement, I turned to my colleague, Mr. MCFADDEN, and smiled, and never interrupted him, as he said I did.

He, irritated, sensitive, commenced to make reference to me. My people are not starving, although they are suffering as they are elsewhere; but in my State, as has been said many times, we do not leave our neighbors to starve, but we take care of them ourselves, and do not ask the Government to do it.

Now, my friends, whether you believe in the Einstein theory of relativity or not, we will all concede that everything in life is relative. A mote upon the breast of the ocean is an infinitesimally small thing, but in a man's eye it is a monstrosity. It is not the ordinary load that bends the back of a beast of burden; it is the extra straw that breaks the camel's back. So, my friends, there are certain things that rise in importance on certain occasions, and certain things that have a most important bearing, and for that reason I want to point out something which has affected me ever since I have come to Congress; in fact, it has been a matter of irritation to me for 30 years—ever since I was a boy.

I receive telegrams, letters, and newspaper accounts of the great power plant which is to be erected in the city of Washington as a part of the great $500,000,000 plan. This is a great city, to which none throughout the world is comparable, with a building program that we are all interested in. And ere many days shall pass our heads it shall rival the greatest cities of the past and put into an insignificant niche the great Athenian capital, and we fully accord with and wish to see this great building scheme carried on. I would not throw a straw in the way, but when this vast sum of money is being spent to render this a beautiful place, and millions are provided for shrubbery and other improvements, and then in the southwest is reared a mighty smokestack to darken the heavens, to pollute the air, and to destroy the otherwise salubrious climate around the city of Washington, is there not something relative, is there not something lacking when we are appropriating such vast sums and fail to provide the simplest protection for the health as well as the beauty and the possible pleasurable enjoyment of this great Capital?

I have never in my life seen a situation such as we have in Washington. Due to the climate in part, yes, but not entirely. I usually walk to the Capitol. Along the sidewalks is the most disgusting evidence of a prevalent disease. I have never witnessed, nor have you, in any place north or south the like of it. If you go to the theater it is a source of constant annoyance, the hacking and coughing and sneezing to interrupt the evening's entertainment. If this soot and dust-laden atmosphere is not one of the causes, nobody will dispute that it does not improve the condition. I have heard many theories. When I was a child living in the city I remember of them speaking of the peculiar throat troubles, and so forth, that we had. Nobody has been able to solve it. I have my own theory. I know that if you go to the mines, unaccustomed to enter, you will show the same symptoms exactly as are exhibited here on our streets, sneezing and hacking and coughing.

If such vast sums are to be spent not only to beautify the city, but for public health, why in the name of common sense are we permitting this constant pollution? The District has laws, but nobody pays any attention to them. Last winter I told you about waking one morning, stifled and choking, and I looked out of my window and one of those heavy fogs was hanging over the city, as usual, and a barrage of smoke came pouring in my window, the like of which the boys at the front never witnessed. I called up the chief of police and he sent one of his sergeants, a big, good-natured Irishman, and when I went to show him the clouds of smoke rising from the surrounding buildings, he leaned on the windowsill, and then looked at his hands; they had become as black as coal as though greased with graphite. He said, "Congressman, this is terrible. I will go and attend to it at once." He went and reported. The chief of police called up and told me that there was no ordinance to stop that sort of thing.

My friends, the old law, the old law of England, has always provided against a nuisance. I said, "If my neighbor, instead of pouring smoke in my window, would have thrown bricks in there, have you got an ordinance against bricks?" Well, finally he said it was under the health department. So it is a health measure. Very well. I took it up with the health department, and they have been working for over a year and still nothing has been done.

Thirty years ago my own parent brought experts here and demonstrated to the satisfaction of the Navy Department that the most practical fuel for war vessels, considering the space on the vessel, safety from spontaneous combustion, efficiency when properly used, freedom from smoke, which was rather important in a battleship, was anthracite coal.

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BRUMM. I yield.

Mr. PATMAN. Crude oil was not generally used 30 years ago.

Mr. BRUMM. No. I am talking about this smoke situation here. When they asked to have it installed in the war vessels, the answer was, "The grate bars do not suit." Ridiculous. Nonsense to talk like that. Penny wise and pound foolish. There was not anything like that. They are installing in this new plant new grate bars, and they will burn the same smoky stuff. But they say, "We shall have smoke arresters." They can not get any consumers that will entirely eliminate the black stifling fumes that arise from those plants.

Look out of your office building on any day when the sky is heavy and see the clouds of smoke rising from the plant that is now being utilized. Members of the departments have admitted to me privately, the very men who are making these investigations, that it is intolerable—the soot on their windows and on their floors. You go to any of the apartment houses down toward the White House, and I will warrant you can not rub your hand over the upholstery without getting it as black as coal.

Now, to add insult to injury I discovered this situation: Over a year ago I was down in the Treasury Department about a matter in which my district was concerned, and a newspaperman told me that in a penitentiary right above my home, in the district represented by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BEERS] they had installed grate bars for soft coal. I thought it was impossible, but I went down to the department and found it was a fact. I had them change that. Now, over a year afterwards I get specifications for a post office in my district, right over a coal mine. The Government bored holes to see how near the surface the coal was before they would accept what we call a surface right, because we have no real estate. The coal rights were bought out years ago. And sure enough they had the same system of smoky fuel ready for installation right over a coal mine. A few days ago my friend from Pennsylvania discovered they were installing it in Allentown. I told them that if they tried to burn that smoky stuff in the anthracite region of Pennsylvania, there would be violence. There is no sense in that kind of thing. Oh, we only come from a little district in Pennsylvania. By the Eternal, in time of need we furnish more help than any like section of the United States, and I can prove it by the books. It is big enough for that.

Now, then, as I say, the time comes when patience is no longer a virtue, and I for one do not intend to remain quiet.

Mr. ROMJUE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRUMM. Yes.

Mr. ROMJUE. The gentleman would not advocate violence, would he?

Mr. BRUMM. I was telling what would happen just as sure as you live.

Mr. ROMJUE. The gentleman could appeal to the same common law about which he spoke a moment ago.

Mr. BRUMM. That is all right. I am talking about facts. I know the people. There is no sense or reason in it to permit that kind of thing.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRUMM. Yes.

Mr McCORMACK. Who is imposing those conditions on your people? The Post Office Department?

Mr. BRUMM. I will tell the gentleman about that in a minute. No; it is not the Post Office Department. That is the real trouble, just like a will o' the wisp, to find just the last one to whom the buck has been passed. The real trouble, in my judgment, lies with these experts.

For illustration, every one of us goes down to the Veterans' Bureau. We have a marginal case which we are convinced beyond any doubt is a proper case for compensation. General Hines has always treated me right, and I suppose he does you other gentlemen here. I do not complain of him, but he says the medical department says this and says that. Why, the medical department is only a little factor in making up the evidence in the case. They say you have no service connection. Well, what do they know about it? They turn to the record; and if it is there, yes; and if it is not there, no, and then you are out. How about the thousand and one bits of positive evidence, more positive than all the medical evidence, that might prove that John or Jim was injured in the service?

Mr. LINTHICUM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRUMM. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. A few years ago you had a law creating a certain charge on every ton of anthracite shipped from Pennsylvania, did you not?

Mr. BRUMM. What does the gentleman mean by "you"?

Mr. LINTHICUM. I mean Pennsylvania.

Mr. BRUMM. I fought it with all the might that was in me, and I say here, with all due respect to my State courts, that I believe it was unconstitutional. Of course, it was only intended as an emergency measure.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I thought so. Has it ever been repealed?

Mr. BRUMM. We got rid of that as quickly as we could.

Mr. LINTHICUM. The State has repealed it?

Mr. BRUMM. Yes.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I am glad to hear that.

Mr. BRUMM. That was ill-advised in every way.

Mr. LINTHICUM. I had the matter up before the Maryland State Bar Association at Atlantic City one time and they thought it was unconstitutional.

Mr. BRUMM. I have always maintained it was and still believe so. Now, they take the word of the experts, and the experts may not know one-tenth as much as you do about the case. When I first went down to the bureau with a very hard case General Hines said, "I absolutely agree with you, Congressman, but it is the law." I said, "It is not the law, General, but it is the expert who interprets that law, and he does not use common sense."

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRUMM. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. In connection with what the gentleman has stated, it is my understanding that under the law a doctor can not apply his own expert knowledge but is limited to the evidence actually on file in the particular claim. In other words, if the evidence on file in the Veterans' Bureau shows that a man has tuberculosis to-day and it is discovered for the first time, under the law—and I am not criticizing anybody, because I have just as high a feeling of respect for General Hines as the gentleman has—the doctor can not say that in his opinion that man had tuberculosis yesterday which, of course, is ridiculous.

Mr. BRUMM. I believe that is practically their rule. That is my understanding. I know of a boy who entered the Army and went through all the war, but he never received a cent of pay, because he kept moving from one hospital to another and had no records at all.

I am sorry I will not have the time to reach the most important part of the whole thing, but I am going to ask the District Committee to try to fashion a law with teeth in it and to ascertain if there is not some way of improving conditions so far as smoke nuisance is concerned in our beautiful Capital City. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. McMILLAN. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. PATTERSON].

Mr. PATTERSON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH] made a most excellent speech on the money question this afternoon, one which gives valuable thoughts for us all; but I intend to make a few observations about the same subject anyway.

Money, as it is known, is a medium of exchange and reaches back into ancient history. It is very important and has always been important since it was brought into use, and it grows more and more so with modern conditions and modern commercial and industrial relationships. There are three or four important facts connected with money. One is the amount of money in circulation, the stability of it, and its purchasing power. These are interlocked and related.

In every great financial crisis we have had we can find it more or less linked up with the subject of money, and going back through history, at different periods we have found, following every great crisis or panic, the net amount of money very much decreased in the country; and not only this, but, of course, naturally the per capita circulation would also be decreased. And in this field the real per capita circulation is always less than it seems for circulation figures do not exclude the amount of money in hoarding. So if we could have the figures with the amount put away excluded the circulation would be small indeed at a time like this. We find conditions like this in 1837, and again in 1858, following the panic of 1857, and also in 1873, and in every other similar situation.

All these periods of deflation have worked quite a bit against certain classes of people. They have always brought hardship on the classes of people that were debtors, and most of the remarks I expect to make on this subject will be along this particular line.

Following these panics or shortness of currency or deflation, just as you have a mind to call it, we have found that the money power or the trusts or the monopolies of the country which control the money have always recovered with a larger percentage of the wealth of the country, while the farmers, laborers, and small business people, and the debtor class of people have gone through each crisis and have come out with less and less of the national wealth.

You can trace this back through the five or six crises we have had. The two most recent ones that I want to refer to are the one in 1920, the one of 1929, 1930, 1931, and on into 1932, and this one is, in my judgment, the greatest of all time.

At the beginning of the deflation in 1920, the American farmer owned about $80,000,000,000 of wealth, which at that time was very nearly one-third of the national wealth. At the peak in 1929 his national wealth had shrunk to a little more than $50,000,000,000; during those nine years, strange to say, the farmer had lost such a large percentage of his national wealth when the country, generally speaking, was prosperous. The great deflation that he suffered in 1920 and 1921 and a lower price for his commodities during the prosperous years brought his percentage of total wealth from a little less than one-third to around one-sixth of the total. We find that while the country as a whole has prospered and increased its national wealth almost $100,000,000,000, the farmer's part of the national wealth had decreased, as I have already indicated. And this very condition has existed, and the recurrence of such crisis has helped to bring the farmer's proportionate share of national wealth from around 60 per cent of the total, to, as estimated to-day, around 12½ per cent of the total.

Now we come to 1929, the greatest period of deflation we have even seen, extending on up to the present time, and no one knows how much farther it will go. I take it for granted that we hope we are at the bottom to-day, but no one can say that even if prosperity is just around the corner that we are able to tell which corner it is.

We find the American farmer to-day worth probably less than one-half, in national wealth, what he was in 1920. We find his mortgage debt increased to nearly $12,000,000,000, and this is the phase of the matter to which I particularly wish to address myself.

I do not have the very latest figures, but at the close of the past year we find that the purchasing power of the dollar is almost $1.51 (in December, 1931), and compared with the average of 1920 it would be about two and one-third times what it was in 1920, and I take the position that the farmers of America and the other debtors or people who owe the debts of this country—and we are, in a way, largely a debtor nation among ourselves, or, in other words, the great masses of the people have been bled white by the money barons of Wall Street, now known as international bankers and manipulators, and are in debt—in spite of our great national wealth, I take the position that with the present purchasing power of the dollar and the amount of commodities that it takes to pay these debts, the American farmers and the people who owe the debts that were contracted during the year of inflation find it impossible to pay these debts, and therefore it devolves upon this Congress and upon the country, if we ever expect to save the farming class of people and the great masses of people, including laborers and business people, who are in debt trying to pay for homes and other things which are necessary in an American home, the class of people who are the backbone of this country, and yet, as I say, who, generally speaking, are in debt for some of these necessities, we must bring about some kind of limited inflation of the currency and bring about a rise in the prices of commodities that the people have to sell in order to pay these debts.

The calling in the money of the money barons which causes prices to fall and the purchasing power of the dollar to rise as it has done by 50 per cent in the past two years, has given a great patriotic and heroic people, such as our farmers and others who are called the ordinary citizens of every class, a setback and a disadvantage from which they can not recover within themselves. This has always thrown millions out of work and each time the result has been the same. Upon recovery more and more of the wealth has been concentrated in the hands of the few and to-day we find ourselves in an intolerable condition which should be dealt with immediately and effectively to bring about immediate and then permanent relief. These conditions should be so changed that it can not occur again. Our people should not be allowed to suffer this way while a few grasp the wealth of the world. This is one of the evils to-day which lie on the steps of this Capitol and I feel this is one measure of relief, and I hope the Glass-Steagall bill will start this and help return men to work and remove some of the iniquities from which our people are suffering at this time.

I want to give you a further comparison, during the 11 years from 1919 to 1929 inclusive, a period when most of these debts were contracted. The average purchasing power of the dollar was 96, on the basis of the 1926 purchasing power of the dollar, compared with the purchasing power of the dollar to-day it will take one and six-tenths times as much in commodities. In other words, it takes one and six-tenths times as much of general commodities of the people of this country to pay their debts as it did in the average years from 1919 to 1929. This is the average throughout this period of 11 years, but when we turn to the farmers we see a more tragic story there.

The purchasing power of the dollar to-day in farm products is about $1.80, nearly one and nine-tenths times the purchasing power of the farmer's dollar; this means the $12,000,000,000 mortgage debt contracted at that time would to-day take nearly $23,000,000,000 in commodities, based on the purchasing power of the dollar when the debts were contracted, to discharge. This shows how the money barons of Wall Street have driven the farmer to the wall. The plight of the laborer, small business man, and professional man is almost as bad, and I feel the time has come, and we stand now at the parting of the ways. Our Government should remedy this situation and do it in a constructive way, and not injure the workingman who earns a salary or wages. In fact, his condition must be bettered; he must have his purchasing power increased, with that of the farmer. It is estimated that to-day there are 8,300,000 without jobs, the largest number in our history. It is estimated that 12,000,000 of our patriotic fellow citizens, just like us, are in need, and that 40,000,000 of our patriotic fellow citizens are living below the minimum standards of living. Nothing will remove this condition except giving these people work. Our people want work and are willing to work. They do not want charity. They want opportunity, and our Government should see that they have opportunity, and that the purchasing power of these people is brought up to allow a safe standard of living, which will afford comfort to our people. The resources and income of our people demand this. I renew my pledge here and now to continue the fight to bring this about.

I throw down the challenge again, that if we are to solve this depression we must give our farmers and workers in every line purchasing power as they should have and then give our people who owe these debts on farms and in every line where these debts were contracted a dollar comparable in value to the dollar which would average only about half what it could buy in commodities at that time compared with what it will not. In other words, without counting interest, the dollar borrowed before 1929 and owed to-day by the farmer is almost $2, when you sum up the price of commodities with which he has to pay.

With the cotton farmer in my section it is much worse, for the purchasing power of cotton is much lower than the average for all farm crops. In fact, in December last the purchasing power of the cotton farmer's dollar was 36 cents, based on the 1926 cotton dollar, and 1926 was itself an unfavorable year for cotton. So you can see why I said in my speech a few days ago that the cotton farmer has only 1 chance in 15 to compete with the Wall Street money lender. Our people must be relieved now.

By far the largest part of our people are honest and persevering and have tried, and are going to keep on trying, but we must help them this time and see that they are not crushed farther down. In fact, we must now begin and raise the people from this pressed-down state to equal opportunity. And if enough members will join me here, we will do that before any other important measure passes; and if enough do not join me to bring this about, I shall do my best to stand and fight to the last with the few who are willing and have shown that willingness.

No one can realize how hard these conditions are unless he has tried to make a living for a family by growing cotton, or laboring, or by working at an underpaid profession, or by running a small business as I have done. Then he feels the hand of oppression. So I say, now, let us meet the challenge by giving our debtor population, through raising the purchasing power of their dollar to a safe and sane level, and set up machinery which will rescue them once and for all from the Wall Street monopoly. It can be done, and it will be done, if our people will march together in solid phalanx and depose those from public office who are not in sympathy with them, or who will not or do not stand and fight their battles. Then readjust our tariff so as to revive our foreign trade which is fast diminishing. Open markets, and again give our people work, thereby giving them purchasing power throughout the land, and prosperity will return, and it will not return, nor it can not return to this country, until these conditions are brought about.

One other thing, and that is a readjustment of the burden of taxation to relieve the farmer and home owner and encourage home owning and farm owning. And when this is brought about we have one more step, and that is economy in government, which should be stressed at this time. Every branch of government should render to the people a service whose value is in excess of cost, and every person holding a public office should render more service to the people than it costs them to run his office. This should be our standard of efficiency and economy.

Our people can not continue with conditions as they are, and we must bring relief by enabling the debtor to pay his debts and clear the mortgage on his farm or home, and raise the income of our people of every legitimate profession, trade, and industry to that of a fair standard of living and comfort as our income and resources justify. Then we shall see joy and prosperity stretching from the firesides of our people of this fair land. This will be beneficial to all. Business will prosper, and we wish to see legitimate business prosper. Goods can be taken from the shelves and used by our people who need them so badly. Farm products can be bought by the workingman and the professional man. All this will benefit all; and it is our duty to not only bring this about but bring about legislation which will prevent a recurrence of this suffering.

I have introduced and am supporting legislation introduced by some others and am sponsoring a program of legislation which I believe will do this.

Then in closing let me say let us give our debtor people relief through their monetary system, which will be just and wise, and then give our people work and a fair income on the farm for their products and everyone who is willing to work throughout the land and revive business and stimulate industry and bring the purchasing power of our people up to what it should be, then prosperity will return and our problems will be largely solved.

This is a great program. I believe that there is hardly anyone who will deny that the Government can largely influence and help bring this about. Then will any dare part try. God help us to try and give our best each day to this task until it is accomplished. Thus shall we be enabled to add our part to carry down through the ages blessings and renown of our Republic, which shall dispense its beneficence, when this is accomplished, to every fireside in the land.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 10 minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. DOXEY].

Mr. DOXEY. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, it is my purpose to talk to you about House bill No. 4650, known as the Smith bill, which is short and to the point. It contains only seven pages and eight sections. A great deal of time has been spent in drafting this bill and it represents the combined thought of a number of men who for several years have labored assiduously for its enactment into law.

The House Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, to which this bill was referred, has held extensive hearings on the proposed bill. The members of this committee have always evidenced great interest and sympathy for this proposed legislation, and both in the Seventy-first Congress and in the Seventy-second Congress reported this bill favorably.

The parliamentary procedure and other vital factors, which I shall not mention here, have heretofore prevented this legislation from being voted on by the Members of the House, but the proponents of this legislation have never ceased their efforts, and at the beginning of the Seventy-second Congress the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation, just as soon as it was organized, granted this bill the right of way and gave us hearings and thoroughly considered it and unanimously made a favorable and comprehensive report on said bill.

It is obvious to those of us who are sponsoring this legislation that some of the same powers are working against the bill that have always opposed it. We understood the parliamentary situation, and the many, many obstacles that confronted us, and knew some of the powerful influences that at every turn endeavored to prevent the Members of Congress from voting on this bill.

So the next step was to prepare and file with the Rules Committee of the House a petition or resolution asking that the Rules Committee give us a hearing and adopt and report a special rule for the consideration of this bill in the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, where we would be enabled to vote on the bill. This bill appears on Union Calendar as No. 21.

The Rules Committee very kindly granted a hearing on the resolution and the bill and for two days courteously and attentively listened to the friends of this measure discuss it and present their case, so to speak. These hearings before the Rules Committee were limited to two days and were concluded on January 28, 1932.

Now, it has been nearly 30 days since we presented our case; yet the Rules Committee has not rendered a verdict and in no wise indicated that they were going to grant and bring in a special rule for the consideration of this bill. In fact, it is reasonable to infer that the majority of the members of the Rules Committee are opposed to this measure or at least to this resolution for a special rule to consider this bill.

On February 3, 1932, which was Calendar Wednesday, some of us had hoped that in the call of the calendar in the House that the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation would be reached, and in that event this bill would be considered and the House given an opportunity to vote on it.

Although the Reclamation Committee was No. 34 on the list, we were led to believe from investigation and conferences with some of the leaders and the various committee chairmen that most of the committees receiving the call on the calendar that day were not ready with proposed legislation that would require any considerable debate and that business would be disposed of rapidly, and the committee having jurisdiction of the Smith bill would be reached, and my colleague, Judge HALL, chairman of the Irrigation and Reclamation Committee, had agreed to call up this measure just as soon as his committee was reached on the call.

The opposition to this measure sensed the situation and immediately upon the call of the calendar began a well-planned filibuster that proved very effective and this measure was not reached before adjournment on Calendar Wednesday, February 3.

Full well do we realize, as has been demonstrated by subsequent events, that the various committees that are entitled to the call ahead of the Irrigation and Reclamation Committee now have duly reported and had placed on the calendar proposed measures that they will insist on being considered and which in a great many instances include legislation that is highly controversial and will necessarily require considerable debate and time when reached on the calendar. Therefore, it is exceedingly doubtful if during this present session of Congress on the call of the calendar of the Committee of the Whole, the Committee on Irrigation and Reclamation will be reached and this bill through this means ever be before the House for consideration at this session of Congress.

Mr. PATMAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. DOXEY. I yield to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. PATMAN. I am in sympathy with the gentleman, and I would like to ask him if there is not some way that we could force a hearing on the legislation?

Mr. DOXEY. I am going to get to that in a moment.

My friends, it is plain, necessary, and may I say imperative, that if we expect to bring the Smith bill up before this Congress for consideration so we can get a chance to vote on it, we must resort to the discharge rule.

The petition or motion to discharge under the rules of the House must be signed by at least 145 Members before it becomes operative. Knowing that it is the most effective weapon now left us in the fight for this most worthy cause, the motion to discharge is prepared and by the early part of next week it will be filed and on the Clerk's desk ready for your signature. May I implore you with all the earnestness that I possess to sign it so this Congress may have the right and privilege to express itself on this legislation.

This bill in the Senate is known as the Glenn bill and is S. 1856. It has been reported favorably by the Senate Committee on Agriculture and Forestry. It passed the Senate at the last session of Congress, and I am sure it will pass the Senate at this session.

Are we going to let it die here in the House just because it means a hard fight? No; a thousand times no!

Sign this discharge motion. Let us by this means bring this measure on the floor of the House for a vote, and when we do we will pass one of the most helpful and most constructive pieces of legislation that has passed this House since I have been a Member of Congress.

From my contacts with the Members of this House, and knowing that there are 34 States of this Union that have problems which this legislation vitally affects, I can not conceive of any reasonable or justifiable opposition in this branch of our Government to this measure which when enacted into law will have such wholesome and far-reaching effects.

At this session of Congress we have passed legislation designed to open the avenues of credit for the banks, trust companies, building and loan associations, railroads, private corporations; in fact, every organized entity in our business structure. Yet, notwithstanding all that has been done to open the floodgates of credit, the Glenn-Smith bill is the only act that will tap the reservoir of credit for the distressed farmers and taxpayers residing within these levee and drainage districts.

The relief provided in this bill is no dole, no gift. It is economically sound and can be put into operation at once. The farmer is given a chance to work out his own destiny on his own land by his own investments. His tax burdens are lightened by low interest and long-time money furnished at no expense to the Government or to the people of the United States.

As I have repeatedly said in the hearings before the committee and elsewhere and to many of you in discussing this bill, I do not think any legislation proposed in Congress, or that has been passed since I have been a Member of Congress, will give more direct aid to distressed agriculture and specifically relieve and actually help the individual farmer and taxpayer than this bill, for which as an individual and as a member of the steering committee I have worked hard and am asking you to support with all the sincerity of my being.

It is not my purpose to trespass upon your time, but I do ask your indulgence to permit me to briefly sketch and analyze this bill—and to some degree, at least, explain its set-up and what far-reaching benefits will accrue to those whom it is designed to help—if it is properly administered.

The caption of this bill speaks for itself—

To provide for the relief of farmers in any State by the making of loans to drainage districts, levee districts, levee and drainage districts, irrigation and/or similar districts other than Federal reclamation projects, or to counties, boards of supervisors, and/or other political subdivisions and legal entities, and for other purposes.

It is well named, and those whom it is intended to benefit richly deserve help and need it immediately—now.

Briefly, here is the body of the bill—

Section 1: Creates a revolving fund out of which the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to loan to any such district an amount sufficient to redeem the outstanding indebtedness.

Section 2: Meaning of district—legal entities. Meaning of bonds—lawful indebtedness.

Section 3: Secretary of Interior to use his judgment in each case when the district makes application for loan. Governing authority of district, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, authorized to compromise with owners of outstanding bonds and secure loans to pay off agreed compromise. Consider and investigate economic value of taxable property, and Secretary of the Interior is to be satisfied the loan will be paid at maturity. Loans may be made annually to take up outstanding indebtedness. But where a compromise is necessary and affects the indebtedness so reduced, it is to be paid off.

Section 4: Property within the district subject to taxation; beginning at end of 10 years the annual taxes must be sufficient to establish a sinking fund which will retire the loan at the maturity dates fixed by Secretary of the Interior.

Section 5: Loans shall be made for a period not exceeding 40 years, to be determined by the Secretary of the Interior, bearing interest of 3 per cent per annum, payable annually; provided during first five years of loan the interest shall accrue and be payable during succeeding years in equal annual installments. These loans shall be secured by issuance and delivery to Secretary of the Treasury by proper authorities refunding bonds payable to United States in amount of loan, etc., and be a lien on all taxable property within said district which may be subject to assessment for payment of bonds. (No additional bonds to be issued without written consent of Secretary of Interior.)

Section 6: Property sold for unpaid taxes and bought by district. District allow owner or his heirs to repurchase said land within reasonable time to be fixed by the Secretary of the Interior and pay amount of taxes only.

Section 7: One hundred million dollars—revolving fund. Twenty million dollars each year.

Section 8: Secretary of Interior to set up machinery, and expenses to be paid out of money herein appropriated.

The individual farmer and taxpayer is given relief by aiding the district as a legal entity of which each taxpayer is a component part.

If we are doing the proper thing in legislative relief for private corporations, how much more eager should we be to pass legislation benefiting legal entities, public in their nature, part of our Government, so to speak, and composed of citizens who have helped make this great Nation the Mecca of the age and who years ago inaugurated these projects for the development of this country and the benefit of mankind.

Those patriotic and progressive people have invested their lifetime savings with the uttermost good faith in these projects and worked day and night in order that these lands might be made productive and useful and the vast area comprising these districts a better and safer place in which to live.

They have courageously carried on until now the burden of taxation can not be met without they receive some Federal aid and an extension of time to meet these obligations that will be met if they are not forced to abandon their homes and lose the accumulations of a lifetime.

This Government, by this legislation, will not lose anything. It is just providing the means, secured by the property, to tide these distressed districts over for a period of years.

I have always been conservative—my record here shows I have always stood for economy in Government. I have opposed and voted against much of the so-called remedial and benevolent legislation passed by this Congress since I have been a Member; but, my colleagues, this legislation is only a loan by the Government to those who live and own property within these distressed districts that are now practically bankrupt.

Extension of time and credit by the Government and the granting of a breathing spell, so to speak, will enable these people to keep their land and their homes and not join the ranks of the unemployed.

They will ultimately discharge these obligations that it is impossible for them to meet now or in the near future. The provisions of this bill give this relief and at the same time protect the Government against loss.

This refunding of the debts will only grant an extension of time and reduce the tax so as to enable the farmer to pay and not default. It gives him a chance and a break that he is justly entitled to.

This plan does not conflict with State laws. It gives farm relief through tax relief. It grants a safe, sane, and practical moratorium for five years on all taxes for drainage, levee, and similar purposes, and thereafter provides for a low rate of interest and further for a long extension of credit.

We all know that agriculture is the basic industry. When the farmer fails all other business must go down and thousands are thrown out of work. The great Committee on Agriculture, of which I have the honor and privilege to be a member, is working day and night to bring before this Congress real constructive legislation that will be of material and lasting benefit to distressed agriculture.

We realize that it is necessary to raise and stabilize commodity price levels, to afford reasonable production credit, better marketing facilities, and legislate on a broader and more direct scale in order to restore agriculture.

Last Wednesday, when the call of the calendar rested with our Committee on Agriculture, we called, considered, and passed a joint resolution to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to aid in the establishment of agricultural-credit corporations, whereby machinery is set up to advance to the individual farmer money in order that he may be able to carry on his business and thereby better conditions generally.

When the purchasing power of the farmer falls and disappears, then comes the woeful reaction upon all business. To my mind, this is the vital factor that has caused the distressing situation with which we are faced to-day. Here is a real opportunity for us to help remedy and aid conditions generally.

The necessity for this relief is more than urgent and demands quick action on our part to avert a calamity over which these distressed people have no control. Nature itself forced this additional burden upon them.

There are more than 325,000,000 acres of land involved and more than 5,000,000 people living within these affected districts—for most part small farmers.

My friends, time will not permit me to give you statistics regarding my own State or even my district. They are, however, incorporated in the hearings on this bill to which I refer you. I can not here go into details. As I see the picture that most of you are familiar with, it is national and not merely local. This constructive piece of legislation will bring real relief and aid those substantial citizens who are the backbone of our Nation and tide them over the breakers that threaten to engulf them. It will make happy homes; it will make better living conditions; it will keep people on the farm and give employment to thousands. It will promote the general welfare of a type of citizenship that has in the past, and will in the future, be the bulwark of this Republic, both in times of war and in times of peace. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Mississippi has expired.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I now yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. PARKER].

Mr. PARKER of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I wish to address myself during the few minutes that have been allotted to me to the provisions of a bill introduced by me on February 16, 1932 (H. R. 9396), to provide for cooperation by the Federal Government with the several States in relieving the hardship and suffering caused by unemployment by authorizing the construction and reconstruction of highways and by authorizing the construction of buildings for certain post offices, and for other purposes.

In the beginning I wish to State that in my opinion the opportunity that the present crisis affords this Democratic House of Representatives to bring the country out of chaos by enacting constructive legislation can only be measured by the needs of the rank and file of our people, which all of us admit are without parallel in the history of the Nation.

When Congress convened in December the Democratic Party, with its glorious heritage of having stood forth magnificently as the bulwark of the people from the time of its conception in the days of Thomas Jefferson, stood on the threshold of an unprecedented victory in the general elections of next November.

Has our party met the issues courageously or has it refused to accept the responsibilities that inevitably rest upon the shoulders of the victor?

First and foremost, we passed the foreign-debt moratorium. In doing this we postponed the collection of $252,000,000 that our sorely depleted Treasury had urgent need of. What does this mean to our people? It simply means that more than $2 in additional taxes must be collected from every man, woman, and child in America if we are to balance our Budget.

What did the champions of Democracy do next? They next presented to the Hoover administration a campaign fund of $2,000,000,000. In passing the Reconstruction Finance Corporation bill our party gave the minority the club with which they will attempt to beat us to death.

Of course, we expected the Republican Party to propose legislation in the interest of the classes. We did not expect Mr. Hoover's administration to shed tears over the sad plight of the masses. Our President had already told us in plain English what his attitude would be toward the unfortunates throughout the country when the people of the Mississippi Valley were dying like rats from hunger and exposure. Disaster had already overtaken them and they were naked and suffering when relief for them was suggested. Despite the fact that America had previously helped the people of other nations in times of peril and disaster, Mr. Hoover proclaimed from the housetops that the Government should not contribute one dollar for relief. Will Rogers and others of his type had to go about over the country and raise the $20,000,000 of funds that were needed for this purpose as best they could. In 1931, after 4,000 of our small banks had failed, while Mr. Hoover was giving out his famous Pollyanna statements, "Prosperity is just around the corner," and at a time when the big banks became shaky, the President changed his mind about the dole, as well as his ideas with reference to relief measures. He proposed to Congress that it rescue the scalawags who have within the last few years sold hundreds of millions of dollars' worth of foreign bonds to the American people, who are to-day suffering because of their losses, while the favored few, for whom he demanded relief, are spending their enormous profits received by them as their commissions.

When this legislation was suggested to Congress it would have been ludicrous, had it not been so distressing, to see Democratic Congressmen falling over each other to support it. In this connection I wish to read a little poem clipped from a recent issue of one of the daily newspapers, entitled "In Ballot Boxes," and written by George Sanford Holmes:

Our Congress and our President,
Upon the evening of election,
Gift-laden valentines have sent
To those they hold in most affection.

For workless wight in hunger ranks
They have no golden greetings tender,
But vote sweet charity to banks,
And mercy to the money lender.

They stint at alms for jobless grief,
But add to bankers' bonds and blisses,
And grant all Europe debt relief;
Signed "Herbert Hoover, love and kisses!"

Ah, well; the voters in bread lines
Know how to write and to remember;
They'll mail their own cute valentines,
In ballot boxes next November!

Although I pride myself on being a Democrat and despite the fact that I have swallowed many a bitter pill, sugar-coated with Democracy, I thank God that these are two sins against my people that I shall not have to answer for. My trouble may be that I am lacking in experience. I was not elected to Congress until September 10, 1931, and I am junior to everybody and his brother. I suspect I just do not know enough to follow the lead and have not sense enough to keep my mouth shut. I make this promise, however—if the leaders of my party do not go straight I reserve the right to blaze my own trail.

When I go back to Georgia and render to my people an accounting, I shall meet them face to face and not one of them can charge me with having forgotten the land of my birth, the tillers of the soil that nurtured me, nor the principles and policies of the party I love, the Democratic Party of Jefferson, Jackson, Cleveland, and Wilson.

Having sounded so many discordant notes and having pictured the clouds that hover over us, I shall turn to topics that are more pleasant, if less interesting. It is an awfully dark cloud that has no silver lining and I am convinced that those I have described to you can be turned inside out and that "although there are shadows in the valleys, there is sunshine on the hills."

At this time I wish to thank the United States Senate for having twice come to the rescue of the people already. The Senate amendment to the Federal land bank bill made that particular legislation worth while. I voted for an amendment in the House, but it was defeated here. I refer to the amendment that appropriated $25,000,000 to be used in carrying over our poverty-stricken farmers, who, otherwise would have been sold out of house and home. Likewise, the Senate made of the Reconstruction Finance Corporation act a much better bill than the one I voted against in the House. The Senate limited the amount of money that can be loaned to one borrower to $100,000,000. The House refused to decrease this amount from $200,000,000. The Senate made it mandatory that 10 per cent of the capital stock of the corporation be loaned to the farmers of the country through the Agricultural Department. In the form that these two measures were finally approved they will be of some benefit to the masses, especially the distressed tiller of the soil in my part of the country. As these measures passed the House, they were worthless to my people.

I find now that many of our Democratic Senators and Representatives are beginning to think as I think, and some of them are beginning to talk as I talk. The morning light is breaking and I sincerely believe that my party will yet offer to Congress a constructive program and to the country some substantial relief. Personally, I expect to vote for every measure that reaches the floor of this House that will grant relief to the common people of the country. I shall not quibble about the language of the bill nor the name that may be given to the particular kind of relief that is proposed. I shall champion the cause of the masses, who heretofore have had so few representatives on whom they could depend.

I care not what you call me, whether it be irregular, radical, or demagogic—that means nothing to me. Nor do I care whether or not I am returned to Congress. I would much prefer to return to my people from Congress with a clear conscience and possessed of that satisfaction that comes to those only who are courageous and unafraid to answer "Here am I" when duty calls.

Heretofore no substantial relief has been offered to the class of people whom I have the honor to represent. I refer to the average citizens of this Nation.

In presenting to Congress for its consideration this bill, H. R. 9396, I am offering a constructive program that will bring relief to the people, and at the same time stabilize the business of practically every business man in every nook and corner of our great country. Since the leaders of my great party have offered nothing better, and since it is impossible to follow the lead of one who does not move forward, I am constrained to ask the membership of this House, Democrats and Republicans alike, to join hands with me and let us do something for our people, for the country, and for posterity.

My people believe I am pursuing the right course, and if you do likewise your people will believe as mine do. [Applause.]

At this point I ask unanimous consent to extend into the RECORD an editorial that appeared in the Hawkeye, a Savannah, Ga., newspaper, in its issue of February 12, 1932.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The editorial is as follows:

CONGRESSMAN PARKER

We are not Congressman PARKER's "press agents." It has not been suggested to us by anyone to pen these lines. We are prompted to speak thus freely in his behalf by our sincere belief that we have as our Representative in the National Congress a man who, without fear or favor, is looking after the interests of his constituents. In this belief we think that the average, hard-working, honest, first-district farmer and business man will concur.

HOMER C. PARKER is not catering to the "blood sucking" vultures who are rapidly becoming the "landed gentry" or the "lords of the manor" of America, while the masses of real citizens are being converted more and more into a state of serfdom. Those pages of history which record the outstanding causes that aroused in the human breast the passion for freedom and which actuated them to spill their life's blood that we might have here in America a government by the people with equal rights for all, are being rewritten right here on the soil in which were sown the seed that liberty might be the harvest to be enjoyed by all. Congressman PARKER is not one, however, to help do this writing.

If we had more "Parkers" in Congress, the rights and privileges that were bought with the price of blood by our ancestors, could be snatched from the money hogs and restored to the masses of the people where they belong.

Seemingly, it does not matter with PARKER whether he is on the big side or with a minority composed of a mere handful, he votes as his conscience and good judgment dictate, after due deliberation as to whether or not a proposed piece of legislation will benefit to any extent the constituency that he represents.

His vote on various bills that have come before the present Congress—the moratorium, the give two billion bill, etc.—has been consistent and shows clearly whose interests he is striving to represent.

Keep the good work up, Mr. PARKER. We are for you.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield such time as he may desire to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MAJOR].

Mr. MAJOR. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of Congress, and those interested, to House Joint Resolution 303, which I have introduced, the purpose of which is to have classified the wheat and corn farmers of this country, according to the amount of each crop produced, as follows: Class 1, all persons, firms, and corporations which, in the year 1929, the last year for which figures are available by the last decennial census, produced not more than 3,000 bushels; class 2, the number which produced between 3,000 and 5,000 bushels; class 3, between 5,000 and 10,000 bushels; class 4, between 10,000 and 20,000 bushels; class 5, between 20,000 and 50,000 bushels; class 6, which produced more than 50,000 bushels; and the resolution directs the Bureau of the Census, Department of Commerce, to supply Congress and the country with such information.

Although the Bureau of the Census has prepared from the individual census returns almost every conceivable set of figures and tabulations, the information called for in this resolution is not available. I am advised by the chief of the Bureau of Agricultural Economics, Department of Agriculture, that the information called for in this resolution would require the checking of approximately 4,000,000 schedules reporting wheat and corn production, and the counting of the number falling within each production group; that these schedules have already been transferred to cards which can be handled by machine, and it is estimated that it would take about 40 days for an operator of a machine to place these cards in their proper production groups, and the estimated cost of making up this tabulation for wheat and corn would be between $3,000 and $4,000.

The purpose of this information must be apparent to any person who has given any attention to the agricultural situation. The cause and the remedy for the low price of farm products in this country is one, no doubt, about which there has been more discussion than any other subject. Glittering promises have been made, many proposals advanced, and millions of dollars expended in what seems a vain effort to relieve the distressing situation. It hardly seems conceivable, with millions of hungry people in the world, that the cause of low prices, especially of corn and wheat, so low as to be far below the cost of production, so meager as to leave a trail of mortgage foreclosures, bankruptcies, and financial ruin to the farming industry unprecedented in American history should be so definitely charged to the energy and industry of those who till the soil by producing in greater quantities than the market will absorb and thereby create what is termed as surplus. Unreasonable, however, as it may appear, every individual, agency, and organization, so far as I am advised, who has devoted talent and energy to this problem, have invariably come to the conclusion that overproduction is the real seat of the difficulty, and have, in proposing measures of relief, proceeded upon the theory that some way must be found to rid the country of the surplus either by reducing production and thereby preventing a surplus, or in finding a way to dispose of the surplus after it is produced. It must be apparent to any student of present conditions—in fact, the last few years certainly have demonstrated—that under the existing order of things there can be no reasonable hope that the farmers of this country will be able to find an additional market for a sufficient amount of their surplus products as to have any considerable bearing upon the situation. The tariff walls, coextensive with the boundaries of the nations of the world, intentionally and deliberately designed to force the people of the various nations to buy and sell within their own borders only, taken in connection with the financial chaos existing in the world have foredoomed any hope the American farmer might cherish that this situation of overproduction can be relieved by finding a market abroad for his surplus products.

The Grain Stabilization Corporation itself, with unlimited Government funds at its disposal, in touch with the markets of the world, after purchasing over 329,000,000 bushels of wheat in an effort to stabilize the wheat market, was only able, up to July 1, 1931, to dispose of 72,000,000 bushels, and one-third of that amount was traded to Brazil for coffee. According to a statement appearing in the press, under date of February 7, 1932, the Department of Agriculture estimates that there is now in America, available for export, 304,000,000 bushels of wheat, about 75,000,000 bushels more than were available this time last year. This amount is in addition to 74,000,000 bushels required as a carry-over, making, in all, the stupendous amount of 429,000,000 more bushels of wheat in the granaries and store places of this country than are needed for domestic consumption. Of this amount, 180,000,000 bushels are in control of the Farm Board, purchased for the purpose of stabilizing the domestic market, and for which there is no market abroad.

The Secretary of Agriculture, in his report to the President under date of November 14, 1931, after describing the deplorable condition of agriculture, said:

> These conditions are vital as long as we maintain our present level of agricultural production. Our agriculture is burdened with surpluses. This has been repeatedly—and, in fact, almost continuously—the case since the war. The burden is especially heavy now, not primarily because of great increases over normal production, but as a result of great changes in the demand for our products.

The McNary-Haugen proposal, with its equalization-fee provision, and the debenture plan of farm relief, both widely supported, especially by the organized agricultural interests of the country, both of which plans have been strenuously opposed by the present and preceding administrations, were based solely on the theory that our surplus production was the basis of agriculture's trouble, and by these plans it was sought to provide a way by which the surplus could be sold abroad for whatever it would bring, spreading the loss thereby entailed over the entire production of the particular product involved.

The Grain Stabilization Corporation, above referred to, under the direction and guidance of the Federal Farm Board, an agency created by the agricultural marketing act passed by Congress at the urgent insistence of President Hoover, has spent millions of dollars in a futile effort to control the price of wheat and cotton by purchasing the surplus and removing it from the market. Hence this governmental agency has recognized and proceeded upon the theory that the farmer's trouble was primarily one of overproduction, for without this theory there was no excuse whatever for its organization or existence.

Every person who has paid even slight attention to the situation must have recognized the absurdity of the Farm Board or any other agency relieving this problem of surplus production by the purchase and storing of great quantities of any agricultural product. It may produce some small benefit while the Government agency is in the market, but after that it makes the situation even worse than it otherwise would have been, because with large quantities of any product in storage it naturally has a depressing effect upon the same product when offered for sale upon the market.

A reading of the hearing had before the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry of the Senate, during November of last year, thoroughly confirms the above statement. In fact the officers of the Farm Board, who appeared before that committee as witnesses, very readily admitted that the stabilization effort had been a failure and it is safe to predict that no such effort will ever again be undertaken in this country. That there is produced in this country a large surplus of wheat and corn for which there is no market abroad and that it is foolish to believe that a reasonable price can be maintained by any agency, governmental or otherwise, purchasing the surplus and storing it, are propositions, to my mind, about which there can be no serious argument.

CORPORATION AND LARGE-SCALE FARMING

One of the very noticeable tabulations prepared by the Bureau of the Census has reference to the number and size of farms in this country, and discloses that while the number of farms from 1925 to 1930 decreased to the extent of almost 100,000, yet the total acreage of farm lands increased during the same time by over 60,000,000 of acres; that the average per farm in 1925 was 145 acres and had increased to 157 acres by 1930. This same tabulation discloses during this 5-year period that while there was an increase in the number of farms with an average of less than 20 acres, chiefly fruit and vegetable farms, that the number of farms over 20 acres and up to 500 acres decreased to the extent of 304,000. This means, allowing four persons to a family, that over a million two hundred thousand persons living on farms in this class in 1925 were put out of business in the five succeeding years. It is also revealed that in what might be called an average-size family farm of from 100 to 175 acres, there has been a decrease in this 5-year period of more than 100,000 such farms. However, this same tabulation discloses that there has been a remarkable increase in the number of farms of from 500 to 1,000 acres, and the increase in the number of farms of over 1,000 acres has been even more remarkable. The number of farms as shown by the 1930 census of over 1,000 acres was placed at 80,620, which represents an increase of 20 per cent in this size farm in this 5-year period.

Income-tax returns as reported by the Bureau of Internal Revenue indicate that there were in the year 1927, 8,454 corporations engaged in farming in this country.

The United States Chamber of Commerce a few years ago made some study of large-scale farms in the United States, and the New York Journal of Commerce, under date of July 29, 1929, in referring to this survey, states:

> The chamber survey, based on the actual operations of 74 farms located in 28 States, averaging 11,797 acres in extent, reveals that the large-scale farms are neither more nor less successful than the family-sized farms. Large-scale farming in the United States, the report reveals, is a well-established industry of considerable magnitude. In 1926 over 9,000 corporations engaged in farming made reports to the Bureau of Internal Revenue. Their gross incomes in that year aggregated $709,000,000, almost 6 per cent of the total gross income of American agriculture.

It is also stated in this same article—

> There is, however, a large number of large-scale farms which have reached the highest state of efficiency and which are making high income to refute the arguments often advanced that farms organized on an industrial scale can not succeed in competition with family-farm enterprises.

In an issue of Agricultural Engineering, under date of January, 1929, is an article entitled "Ten Years' Experience in Manufacturing Wheat on 1,000 Acres," by Thomas D. Campbell. This is a very interesting article on how one man managed a sufficient number of acres to produce 100,000 bushels of wheat in one year, and I quote the following very striking statement contained in this article:

> It is hard to investigate agriculture without becoming too enthusiastic as to the possibilities that are present for the engineer. I know that there is no opportunity in all creation to-day equal to the opportunity which the agricultural engineer has before him. I have stated many times that there is no industrial opportunity in the United States equal to the opportunity of industrial farming. There is no capital investment which you can make to-day which will yield as big a return over a period of 10 years as industrial farming.

The lack of information as to the extent of the development and increase of large-scale farming is set forth in a special survey of this matter, made by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics in 1925, as is disclosed by the report of this survey found on page 535 of the Yearbook of the Department of Agriculture for the year 1931. In this article it is stated:

> It is common knowledge that there are a number of well-organized farms that should be classed as large businesses, but there is little information as to the number and size of units included in the class.

Here the statement is also made—

> Advantages and disadvantages of the large farm have been the subject of much discussion during the past few years. Some people have advocated the application of "big business" methods to farming, whereas others have expressed serious doubts as to the desirability of the decrease in the number of family-size farms which would probably accompany any marked increase in the operation of farms as large business enterprises.

This report is interesting in that it discloses the same tendency with reference to the increase in the acreage and number of large farms in the period from 1920 to 1925 as it was from 1925 to 1930, as heretofore pointed out. According to this report, while the number of farms with less than 1,000 acres decreased during this period to the extent of 72,000 in number, there was an increase of some 4,000 in the number of farms above 1,000 acres. This report also discloses that there were 11,791 wheat farms in the United States in the class above 1,000 acres; that 9,500 of these farms contained between 1,000 and 2,000 acres, and another 1,000 were in the 2,000 to 3,000 acre group. Assuming the average acreage of these 9,500 farms to be 1,500 acres and the 1,000 farms to be 2,500 acres, and also assuming these large wheat farms increased 20 per cent in number between 1925 and 1930 as large farms generally increased, and estimating the wheat yield at 18 bushels per acre, there was produced in 1930 on these large farms about 350,000,000 bushels of wheat, or about two-fifths of the entire production in this country.

In the Country Home magazine of February, 1931, is a remarkable story of large-scale farming by corporations, and the article is entitled "Look Out for the Engine." It relates how John D. Rockefeller, jr., loaned $150,000 to the Fairway Farming Corporation of Montana, whose business was the raising of wheat on a large scale. The project was started in 1925, and some 15,000 of acres were operated, divided into units of 800, 1,200, 1,800, and 3,000 acre tracts. This corporation in one year, so it is stated, produced more than 300,000 bushels of wheat. The most elaborate machinery obtainable was installed and man power used in production was reduced to a minimum. The article referred to discloses that on a 3,000-acre unit, using a 12-plow, 50-horsepower tractor, capable of pulling 60 feet of grain drills, wheat was produced on a cash operating cost of 21 cents a bushel, with man labor of 54 minutes per acre, and the statement is made "with land enough and big enough, a bushel of wheat can be grown and threshed with three minutes or less of human labor." Prof. M. L. Wilson, the manager of this great farming corporation, gives "economy of immensity" as the chief result of this colossal experiment and predicts "it will remove from agriculture all but the ablest of those now engaged in it," and gives as his deliberate opinion "that the American farmer will go capitalistic like other big businesses, and that world forces will either make of the small farmer a big farmer or make him quit."

This same experiment is described in the Country Gentleman of May, 1929. It is boasted as a great achievement that one man operated a 3,000-acre farm, all under cultivation. Wheat was produced on this farm at a cost of $8.70 per acre, as compared with an average cost of $14 per acre the country over.

Prof. W. E. Grimes, of the Kansas State Agricultural College, is authority for the statement contained in the Country Gentleman of May, 1929, that in eastern Kansas it is possible for three men to handle 30,000 acres of land, 10,000 acres in cultivation with 20,000 acres for grazing.

Under date of January 15, 1932, in a letter directed to me in response to an inquiry as to what portion of wheat and corn was produced on large farms, the Bureau of Agricultural Economics, of the Department of Agriculture, submitted a table which the letter pointed out contained a mere estimate, as the department had no figures on which a definite statement could be made. However, the estimate as shown by this tabulation discloses that about 89 per cent of the farms reporting corn produced less than 1,000 bushels each, and that the other 11 per cent produced corn in excess of 1,000 bushels each, but it is disclosed that the former class produced only 52 per cent of the total production, while the latter class produced 48 per cent of the total production. In other words 11 per cent of the farmers producing corn produced 48 per cent of the total production, while the other 89 per cent produced only 52 per cent of the total production. This same tabulation discloses that 96 per cent of the farmers producing wheat produced less than 1,000 bushels each; that only 4 per cent produced more than 1,000 bushels each, but that 96 per cent only produced 64 per cent of the total production, while the 4 per cent produced 36 per cent of the total production. In other words 4 per cent of the wheat farmers produced considerably more than one-half as much wheat as the other 96 per cent produced and therefore this 4 per cent contributed one-half as much to the surplus and the destruction of those thus engaged as the remaining 96 per cent.

At my request the legislative reference service of the Library of Congress has made a thorough study and research of the subject of "wheat and corn production in the United States in accordance with size of crop produced," and under date of January 25, 1932, furnished me with a lengthy and somewhat exhaustive report of its study. The report is of such length I do not care to include it in its entirety, but desire to quote from it as follows:

The producers of wheat and corn in the United States are not classified in accordance with the size of crop they produce. Census reports show the number of farms in the United States classified according to their acreage. The total acreage of farms in the various-size classes from which crops are harvested is given by counties. The reports, however, lack data as to the character and size of the crop. It is manifestly impossible to base any computation of value or accuracy on these data. There is a wealth of material available in various agricultural publications on large-scale farming, but there is a decided lack of data as to the extent to which corporations control farming operations.

In 1928 the Montana State College of Agriculture made a survey of 100 of the most successful wheat farms in that State to find out something about the relation of the scale of their operations to their success. They found that the average acreage in this group of highly successful farms was 1,045 acres in 1924, 1,130 acres in 1925, 1,250 acres in 1926, 1,625 acres in 1927, 1,900 acres in 1928, and an estimated average of 2,400 acres in 1929.

Agricultural economists and others have written much on large-scale farming but have generally confined their interest to the economies effected by the use of industrial methods, the increased efficiency of group management, or mere description of the methods of operation on the various large-scale farms. Of some 250 references to magazine articles, newspaper articles, and books on the subject of large-scale and corporation farming in the United States, contained in a bibliography prepared by the Bureau of Agricultural Economics of the United States Department of Agriculture, none apparently deals directly with the problem under consideration.

The increasing production of wheat on large farms has been regarded as a factor contributing to the present surplus of that commodity. The extent to which this is true can not at present be accurately determined. It may be noted, however, that in Kansas, the principal wheat-producing State according to the reports of the Bureau of the Census and the Department of Agriculture, there was in 1929 a considerable reduction in the acreage from which crops were harvested in farms of less than 280 acres, while at the same time there was a very material increase in the acreage from which crops were harvested in farms of more than 260 acres. These statistics do not indicate just what the crops were, but the total wheat acreage in Kansas increased from 9,716,922 acres in 1924 to 12,081,021 acres in 1929.

This report just quoted includes a list of many projects of corporation and large-scale farming, some of which I have heretofore referred to.

THE FAMILY-SIZE FARM SHOULD BE MAINTAINED

I am unable to reconcile myself to the idea but that the passing of the family-size farm is one of the greatest menaces now confronting this country. Millions of our people have spent their lives upon a 160 or 200 acre farm, thrilled with the pride which comes from the ownership and operation of such a farm. Their honest and frugal efforts, their independence and self-reliance have contributed more to the well-being of society and government than any other force. On every hand to-day we find men—leaders in business, finance, and politics—who owe their success in life to the essential, fundamental characteristics instilled into their lives while they resided on the farm home, where every member of the family was a fixed and necessary part of the enterprise. The destruction of these family farms through bankruptcies, mortgage foreclosures, and otherwise; the substitution of the engine and engineering schemes of farming for the individual effort of the family-size farmer and members of his family, to my mind is one of the most dangerous signs of the many distressing problems of the day.

The accumulation of great tracts of land, under one ownership and management, whether it be by individual, company, or corporation, the industrialization and mechanization of agriculture, will do for the family-size farmer of this country exactly what the chain store has done for the independent merchant, and, as is boastingly stated in the article heretofore quoted, "will make of the small farmer a big farmer or force him to quit." It has already caused thousands of them to quit, and an unrestricted continuation of this large-scale and corporation farming will force thousands more to cease agricultural pursuits.

Instead of the present conditions where it is impossible for the small farmer to compete with this large-scale business and where he is rapidly being annihilated by a surplus production, some way must be found to remedy the situation, by legislation if necessary, so that the farmer of ordinary means and acreage will again have an opportunity and be permitted to occupy his former and useful place in the affairs of our land.

WHAT CAN BE DONE

In an address prepared by Mrs. James C. Stone, chairman of the Federal Farm Board, for delivery before the National Cooperative Council convened at Washington, D. C., on January 26, 1932, in discussing the agricultural marketing act it is stated:

The law contemplates adjustment of production to the probable consumer's demand, and this seems absolutely necessary if farmers are to get a fair return for their products.

What has the Farm Board done to bring about this adjustment? Its efforts have been confined entirely, which perhaps was as far as it could go under existing law, in urging a reduction in the amount of production by voluntary action on the part of the farmer. This program has been a dismal failure, but such failure might naturally have been expected, in fact it was inevitable, with millions of farmers, scattered all over this great country, small farmers and big, not organized to cope with such a gigantic situation; it was preposterous to even believe such a voluntary plan could succeed. This proposal of voluntary crop reduction is on a par with the advice, "Plow up every third row," given to the cotton farmers of the country.

If it is essential that acreage and production be decreased in order to relieve ourselves of the surplus, why not require those who are producing in such large quantities to contribute to this decrease in proportion to the amount of their production? The corporation or individual who is producing 50,000 bushels of wheat per year is contributing as much to the surplus as 25 family farmers who are producing 2,000 bushels each, and this large producer is not only destroying himself but 25 of his fellow farmers at the same time. Why should not the amount of production be regulated by legislation, by requiring those who produce in large quantities to turn over to the Farm Board a certain per cent of their production, exempting the farmer who produces, say, a maximum of 3,000 bushels, increasing the amount required to be turned over as the amount of the production increases. This is somewhat along the same theory that income taxes are applied, where the per cent exacted increases as the amount of income increases. A plan of this kind would do two things: First, it would retard the increase in large-scale farming and increase the number of small farmers; and, second, it would enable the Government to control without cost a surplus production of wheat or other crop, which surplus—or, at least, a reasonable amount of it—could be held as a safeguard against a shortage in crop production the succeeding year, and after that purpose had been served this surplus could be used for charity purposes in this country or sold abroad for whatever it would bring, and the proceeds distributed among those who had contributed to this surplus-reduction process in proportion to the amount which each was required to contribute thereto. In this manner the Government could regulate and control the surplus so that the producers would receive a fair price.

I know many objections will be raised to this suggestion. It will be claimed it is not constitutional, and it may not be, but the idea is worth studying and developing. This Congress has passed legislation to aid the financial institutions of the country which can be justified only by the deporable condition which exists. In no line of human activity is that condition more deplorable than in agriculture. Give the farmers, those who are depending on the proceeds from a 160 or 200 acre farm for a living, a fair price for their products, and the return of that long-promised prosperity will be in full swing. The purchasing power of this large and important portion of our population will soon have in motion the wheels of industry, labor will be employed, unemployment will diminish, and happiness and contentment will again be with our people.

Whatever may be thought of the suggestion which I have advanced, it will be worth while to have compiled the tabulations requested in this resolution. It certainly will be informative to learn from the census returns how much of this surplus is produced by the family-size farmers and how much by those who farm with the admonition, "Look out for the engine." I hope my resolution may have favorable consideration.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. LANKFORD] such time as he may desire.

Mr. LANKFORD of Georgia. Mr. Chairman, I am resolved and determined that this Congress shall pass some real legislation for the farmers or I shall do everything humanly possible to make known why it is not done. No one has a right to pose as the friend of the farmer unless he bona fide strives to help the farmer get a much better price for his products; and to stop the present wholesale foreclosure of farm loans; and to give the farmer much better treatment in matters of taxation; and to put the farmer on an equality with other enterprises, as promised by both the Democratic and Republican Parties.

None of the laws passed by this or any other Congress do these things, but on the contrary, most laws, especially by this Congress, are injurious to the farmer and the average citizen and are in behalf of others. Of only slight value is the little money loaned grudgingly for production purposes. There would be no need of loans to farmers at all if they had been given a square deal heretofore.

Government loans to farmers are destroying them instead of helping them. I am in favor of good roads and other public improvements, but what consolation is it to a farmer for a good road to be paved by his home after it has been sold out from under him and his family? I favor reduction of larger salaries, the consolidation of the bureaus, and the elimination of all unnecessary expense, but what good do all these things do the farmer who loses his home, the laborer who is out of a job, the bank depositor who has lost his money, and the independent business man who has been closed out unless these poor unfortunate people are placed back in the economic scheme where they were before this depression.

To my mind, all that Congress may do or has ever done in the past sinks into insignificance and is the bitter ashes of failure if we allow our farmers to lose their homes by foreclosures, and force those farmers who are still able to produce to continue to produce and further enslave themselves and their families by standing by and seeing their products taken—not bought—at less than the cost of production.

Nothing in our Nation is worth saving other than our homes and those who live in our homes, and by our homes I mean the abodes of the laborers, the farmers, and the common people, be those homes ever so humble and be those homes the abode of the tenant, the hired man, or the poorest of the poor, just so that home is the place where there is to be found the unit of our American civilization—the American family.

Henry Grady said, "Teach a man that his sovereignty is beneath his hat, linking to a spot of earth, and his loyalty will save the Republic when the drum tap is futile and the barracks are forever deserted."

The home of the citizen is the citadel of strength of the American Nation. Save this and we save all. All the laws ever written into the books, all that ever will be enacted, and all the platitudes of designing politicians become empty mockery and a national disgrace if the American homes are blotted from our national life.

At any price we must save our homes, and we must save the homes of the independent patriotic farmers and their families.

Ah, Mr. Chairman, we must stop the present orgy of loan foreclosures or cause our Nation to suffer an irreparable injury and drift toward oblivion like a ship with only a horde of incompetent wild pirates aboard and without a pilot or a sail.

The farmer is the keystone of the arch of prosperity. Let us make our Nation a paradise of happy, prosperous, contended farmers, and all else will be well. Let us do this, and the depression will disappear like morning dew before the rising sun.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, there are no further requests for time on this side.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. Cox] 20 minutes.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, in the effort to stimulate interest in Philippine independence, I make this my second appearance to discuss this question.

Much may be said of apparent irrelevancy to the issue, that is, the capacity of the people of the islands to maintain a stable government, but understanding of the whole problem should be aided by laying down a proper background.

After the United States had taken the islands by a war of conquest carried on wtihout constitutional sanction the question of fixing their permanent status became of wide interest. However, the possibility of making decision consistent with declaration of intentions made at the beginning of the war with Spain was soon foreclosed on account of the fact that independence became an issue in a memorable contest between the two great political parties of the country. Except for this unfortunate development the whole question might have been fought out on the issue drawn between imperialism on the one hand and democracy on the other, between those who believed that the welfare of the Filipinos would be best served by permitting them to work out their own salvation with sympathetic aid and those who contended that their subjugation for an indefinite time was necessary to their preparation for self-government.

It was, of course, expected that our professional soldiers would champion the cause of imperialism. They always do. Theirs is the trade of war, and conquest makes for war. But even with this tremendous influence the imperialist could not have won except for the greed of capitalism that found expression in the activities of big business which wanted the Philippines for the ostensible purpose of expanding our commerce with China, but which was more for the opportunity that was afforded of exploiting the Filipino people. The fact might as well be stated, for it is a fact, the subjugation of these islands was demanded because of the profit which it was thought they would bring to American business and not because of a sense of duty of holding them for their own good.

The political contest of 1900 was decided upon issues other than Philippine independence; but because the question was involved, it settled for the time being the fate of this unfortunate people who had fought half a hundred revolutions for independence.

All official or semiofficial studies of the Philippines of this period were political in character and made to justify the policy already inaugurated and hoped to be continued, all bottomed upon the assumption that the Filipinos were incapable of self-government. It was familiar propaganda at the time that the Filipino people were divided amongst themselves, and yet disclosures made at a later date showed that there was perfect unity and cooperation between them. The president of the first Philippine Commission said "Aguinaldo was the incarnation of the feelings of the Filipinos," and General McArthur said, "I have been reluctantly compelled to believe that the Filipino masses are loyal to Aguinaldo and the government which he leads."

There had been developed throughout the centuries of their struggle for independence a perfect cohesion of the people that led up to the establishment of a national government "founded in the sacred and natural bond of blood, language, uses, customs, ideals, and sacrifices," such a union as did not exist between the Colonies when they went to war for independence.

It could not be said in truth that a people who had struggled for near four centuries for the right of self-expression were unfitted for self-rule; and who is to be the judge of the justness and benevolence of the government that they inaugurated and would have supported except themselves? Read the provisional constitution of the Philippines and the laws promulgated and learn something of the political wisdom and understanding of the Filipino leaders and of the spirit of the people who formed it.

These people are not lawless by nature but are a well self-disciplined race and are committed to the republican form of government. The inauguration of civil government by Governor Taft was resisted by our then military masters, who favored the prosecution of the war to the utter extinction of all resistance to foreign rule. But civil government was nothing more than government by law, a law, it is true, enacted by a foreign power for local application, but nevertheless a law that promised better rule than that to which they had theretofore been accustomed.

The policy of Governor Taft had as its objective the colonization of the islands. It was a modification of earlier presidential policy and was instituted out of deference to American public opinion. Almost unlimited powers were lodged in the hands of the governor and the commission. Laws were made and altered to accommodate the ambition of American office seekers who filled all places of importance in the Philippine government.

The business of one nation governing another without that other's consent is one difficult of satisfactory performance, and except for this change of policy, which the Filipinos were led to believe was a promise of self-rule leading to speedy independence, greater difficulty in their pacification would have been experienced. The imperialists ceased to talk of conquest and territorial expansion, taking discretion to veil their motives behind benevolent supervision.

A brief statement as to the principal legislation affecting the Philippines might be informative to some who have not had the time or opportunity to examine the records and therefore not prove to be a complete waste of time. But preliminary to doing this permit me to remind you that sovereignty over the Philippines came to the United States by reason of the treaty of Paris, which after ceding control, provided—

> That the civil and political status of the native inhabitants of the territory hereby ceded to the United States shall be determined by the Congress.

With the adoption of the treaty the sovereignty of the United States was extended to all the islands, and, although the Constitution does not usually operate of its own force in the Philippines, those general provisions, such as the prohibition against slavery and involuntary servitude which restricts the power of Congress in any part of what Chief Justice Marshall called the "American empire," did become operative because they are coextensive with sovereignty, and this is true despite the fact that Congress in the Philippine bill of 1902 provided that section 1891 of the Revised Statutes of 1878 should not apply to the Philippines. This section of the statute reads:

> The Constitution and all laws of the United States which are not locally inapplicable shall have the same force and effect within all the organized Territories and in every Territory hereafter organized as elsewhere within the United States.

It should be remembered that with the ratification of the treaty of Paris the war powers of the President did not end. It was in the exercise of these powers that the war against the Philippines was carried on, and by reason of this power all orders of the President with express application to the Philippines became a part of the organic law of the islands. Presidential contribution to Philippine constitutional law is found in the instructions of President McKinley of April 10, 1900, directed to the Philippine Commission. This was later ratified and supplemented by congressional action in the Philippine bill of July 1, 1902, and then again by the Philippine autonomy act of August 29, 1916.

There were two commissions set up by the President in the Philippines. The first functioned as an aid to the Government in shaping a Philippine policy. Their service covered the period of military rule of the islands. The second commission was set up to experiment with the establishment of civil government. It is to be noted that under the war powers the President established military rule and then civil government.

Instructions to the second commission, said to have been prepared by Secretary of War Root, is a very remarkable document, called by one writer the Magna Charta of the Philippines, and of them another writer said that they were "the most nearly perfect example of organic law, jurisprudence, guardian of rights, distribution of powers, administrative provisions, checks, and balances civilization ever beheld in a single document."

Under the instructions the commission took over the military power of the President, that was legislative with certain executive functions, among them being the right to make appointments. The Philippine bill of 1902 was entitled "An act temporarily to provide for the administration of civil government in the Philippine Islands." You will note the use of the word "temporarily." This language was chosen out of deference to strong public sentiment demanding withdrawal from and complete surrender of the islands.

The minority of the House Committee on Insular Affairs reported a bill entitled "A bill to establish a stable and autonomous government in the Philippine Islands, and for other purposes," and in the report said:

> The theory upon which this substitute measure is based is that there should be conferred upon them (the Filipino people) for a period of eight years the largest possible share in the government of themselves and in the conduct of their affairs, consistent with our safety and best interests and our duty and obligations to the nations of the world, in order to fit them for that absolute independence and self-government to which the minority believe them entitled.

A somewhat similar bill was offered at the same session of Congress in the Senate.

The Philippine autonomy act of 1916, commonly known as the Jones Act, committed the country once and for all time to Philippine independence, but upon the wholly unworthy and aggravating proviso, "when a stable government can be established in the islands," a condition which the Congress of the United States and not the people of the Philippines are to determine when it has been met and fulfilled.

In the preamble to the Jones Act of 1916 will be found this language:

> It was never the intention of the people of the United States in the incipiency of war with Spain to make it a war of conquest or for territorial aggrandizement, and it is, as it has always been, the purpose of the people of the United States to withdraw their sovereignty over the Philippine Islands and to recognize their independence as soon as a stable government can be established therein.

And upon this basis the act was constructed.

In the bill as reported to the House a provisional government was provided for with assurances of full independence to the islands on July 4, 1921. The bill, as passed by the House October 14, 1914, promised independence to the Philippines but was not taken up by the Senate at that session. At the succeeding session of Congress the Senate Committee on the Philippines, reported out a bill slightly different to the House bill of 1914. When this measure came up for consideration there was attached to it what is known as the Clark amendment, granting independence in not less than two nor more than four years, and the bill was passed by the Senate in this form.

The House rejected the Senate bill with the Clark amendment. Differences between the two Houses went to conference, which committee reported the Jones bill in present form.

The Jones Act largely superseded the Philippine bill, and is more nearly an organic law for the Islands than the previous bill. In form and substance it partakes of the nature of a constitution. There are provided a framework of government, a bill of rights, certain positive powers and prohibitions. It is also superior to the Philippine bill from an administrative point of view. Under the bill executive powers are lodged in the Governor General appointed by the President, with the consent of the Senate, subject, of course, in certain instances to presidential veto and congressional action.

The Filipino people have no voice in the selection of their Governor General, and such weaknesses as have developed in the administration of the law are largely traceable to the exercise of the executive powers of the Governor General. Nevertheless, the bill formally laid down the policy of the Government toward the Philippines and definitely promised independence.

In 1898 Commodore Dewey said that the Filipinos were capable of self-government. Since then 34 years have gone by and still they are under the rule of a foreign power.

In 1900 President McKinley believed that conditions in the Philippines had improved to the point that civil government could be set up, and accordingly this was done in his instructions to his commission. Since then 32 years have passed, and still we hold them.

In 1902 Congress adopted the Philippine bill, which provided for temporary civil government. Since then 30 years have passed, and still the islands are ours.

In 1902 the minority party in the House favored granting freedom to the Philippines not later than 1910. This was 30 years ago, and still we hold them, with the right to do with them as we please.

In 1914 the original Jones bill was reported to the House providing for complete independence July 4, 1921. Eighteen years have gone by, and still they are a subject people.

In 1915 the Senate passed a bill granting independence not earlier than 1916 and not later than 1918. This was 17 years ago, but the Philippines are not yet free. And then came the Jones Act of 1916 promising independence when, in the judgment of the Congress, the Filipino people were capable of maintaining stable government, and that is the issue that confronts us at this time.

What tests of the problem are we going to apply? Must it be such government as would serve the needs of the complex life of the American people? Or shall it be one of better application to the simple life of the Filipinos? But make it what you please, the Filipinos are prepared to meet every reasonable demand. History does not tell the story of another people who have made the progress within the same length of time as has been made by the Filipinos since their subjugation by the United States, urged on, of course, by the promise of early independence.

They have adopted a system of jurisprudence comparable to that of the most progressive and enlightened states.

A people's laws are largely determined by their form of government. While the government of the Philippines is modeled after that of the Federal and State Governments of the United States, there is a difference in many respects, due to a want of sovereignty of the people in their government. It is republican in form, and in that sense it is representative within the limits of power delegation by Congress. There can be but little doubt, if given their freedom, they will continue along the lines upon which they have so far advanced, and this in spite of the fact that oriental tendencies strongly incline to the concentration of power in the hands of the few.

There is no great fear of an oligarchy supplanting democracy, but out of the conflict of the two ideals there may eventually develop a government which will be paternalistic in form, one which more nearly conforms to oriental psychology.

The most glaring difference between administrative law of the United States and the Philippines is in respect to the right of trial by a jury. The denial of this right to the islands was not objectionable to them, for their system of jurisprudence was founded upon the civil law. This practice would hardly be changed with independence.

The Filipinos are a united people. Their age-old struggle for self-determination had welded them into a common whole long before their transfer to the United States. In religion they are Christians, less than 9 per cent adhering to any other faith. This is the chief contribution that Spain made to their civilization.

From the standpoint of education there is less illiteracy there than is to be found in many of the olders states, such as Brazil, Greece, Bulgaria, China, Mexico, Cuba, Turkey, Russia, Palestine, Spain, and many others.

The public-school enrollment in 1929 was 1,076,707. In the same year there were 28,000 teachers doing public-school work; of these less than 300 were Americans. In that year they maintained 697 private schools with an enrollment of 100,000. Their great university, the University of the Philippines, had an enrollment in 1929 of 7,553, and in the same year conferred 774 degrees. Thirty per cent of the total national budget of the islands is expended for educational purposes. They support 180 publications, 27 of them being daily papers with a daily circulation of 200,000. The Government maintains a circulating library with a million and a quarter readers, and such other activities as are carried on by progressive States are maintained and supported by the Filipino people. For 30 years we have dangled above the heads of the islanders but just beyond their reach the priceless gem of freedom, the very soul of a people, which must ultimately die if independence be denied them.

In strength and patience they have borne their grievance in the hopeful expectation that American conscience would return from its long vacation and give consideration to the fulfillment of the country's plighted word. Gentlemen say not now but later.

Delay is dangerous in peace as well as war. It sets a precedent that wrong pleads with great persuasion. From it grows up distrust that rusts out the bonds of friendship and the basis of mutual understanding.

Whatever justification may be offered for this long procrastination, the time has come for action, for good intentions lose their nobility when expressed alone in words.

Delay is as dangerous for the United States as it is for the Philippines. The islands constitute our chief military weakness. They bring down upon us world suspicion and the constant dread of war. They are paralyzing American agriculture and impoverishing a quarter of the population of the land. For the Philippines, delay is breaking the hope of a people who trusted us. It is killing the national spirit of a whole race. It is destroying their individual initiative and breaking their faith in the high intentions of this Republic.

We hear the proposal to give the Filipinos their freedom denounced as cowardice. Is it cowardice to be merciful and do justice? If slavery be a desperate ill, is it cowardice to administer an immediate cure? Is it cowardly to protest against the destroying work of privilege which places a crown on the heads of the few and a cross on the backs of the many? If men be cowards who strive to push out the frontiers of human liberty, then who are the brave? Is it he who wears the lion's hide and carries a self-hacked sword, terrorizing the weak into submission to the strong? If this be so, then may God have mercy on the brave, for in this instance they do but serve that unfeeling and remorseless lust for gold, "the last corruption of degenerate man."

What is the demand of honor? Not that bastard sort of honor born as of yesterday that throws nature into revolt with itself, but honor that is old, the offspring of truth and virtue, blood-brother to the golden rule, the constant companion of morality. Is it that we go forward and act with faith and courage, doing that which we know to be right, or that we stand still and do nothing, which we know to be wrong? In the answer gentlemen will write their faith in freedom's cause. [Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield 15 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. IGOE].

Mr. IGOE. Mr. Chairman, to-day we have under consideration a bill carrying another enormous appropriation for a continuation of the Prohibition Bureau. This is just another waste of money in a miserable attempt to enforce an unenforceable law.

It is of more than passing interest that only the Prohibition Unit is immune from the economy acts. One of the pledges upon which Members of my party were elected to this House, and which went a long way toward giving our party control of this body, was a pledge of economy. The Federal Treasury is confronted with a deficit which at the end of the present fiscal year may reach the staggering sum of $3,000,000,000.

When the Democrats took control of the House of Representatives the leaders pledged themselves to cut appropriations to the bone. The record of the Appropriations Committee thus far made in this session is one to be proud of. To date that committee has completed the preparation of four appropriation bills—the first deficiency, the Department of Agriculture, the Department of the Interior, and the bill covering the activities of the State, Justice, Commerce, and Labor Departments. This committee has achieved the almost impossible task of reducing the appropriations for these various departments by over $36,000,000 under the amounts recommended by the President and the Bureau of the Budget. I do not believe that this cut in the appropriations will impair the efficiency of a single bureau or department of the Government in the slightest degree. I repeat this is a splendid record. It is in keeping with our party pledge and it is most gratifying to the taxpayers.

Prior to the convening of Congress the President gave a pledge of strict economy. He instructed the Budget Bureau to reduce its estimates of appropriations to the lowest possible figure consistent with Federal efficiency. Yet what do we find in the case of the Prohibition Enforcement Bureau? Simply this, that it alone is immune from retrenchment; that it alone must not have its appropriation cut a single dollar. The item carried in this bill for the Prohibition Enforcement Bureau is over eleven millions of dollars. This is exactly the sum appropriated for the current fiscal year and is again recommended by the Bureau of the Budget.

I maintain, Mr. Chairman, that this is contrary to the spirit of the times. It is not in keeping with our pledge of economy. Of all the manifold activities of the Government, why should the Prohibition Unit alone continue to be given the large sums of money with which it is attempting to enforce an unenforceable statute? We hear a great deal said about salary reductions. Labor is taking a cut in wages. Dividends are being either passed or reduced, and only the Prohibition Unit is immune from the order for economy.

On every occasion when an appropriation measure was considered in this House during this session of the Congress, the cry was raised about the excessive cost of government and the necessity for increased taxes. Yet, in this measure we are proposing to go along keeping the cost of government, in so far as enforcement of the prohibition law is concerned, on the same high level it has been in the past. I am opposed to this, because I believe it is against the wishes of the people and is a violation of the spirit which has actuated us in the consideration of other appropriation items. For this reason I shall seek to bring about the elimination of the entire amount carried in this bill for the activities of the Prohibition Unit.

Mr. McCORMACK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. IGOE. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. The gentleman used the words "high level." The gentleman means the high level with reference to cost, does he not?

Mr. IGOE. Yes; that is exactly what I mean.

The prohibition question has been a political football, kicked around by everybody for more than 10 years for want of a definite proposal for its solution. In the not far distant future, the Members of this body will be called upon to vote on the Linthicum-Beck resolution, "proposing an amendment to the eighteenth amendment of the Constitution," the first five lines of which are in the identical language recommended by all 11 members of the Wickersham Commission, in case the eighteenth amendment were to be revised. The remainder of the resolution restores to the States their right to deal with the liquor problem, with adequate Federal protection to those States desiring to remain dry. I am sure every Member of Congress, as well as my own constituency, knows that I am for the straight-out repeal of the eighteenth amendment. To my mind, such action would do more to solve the great and acute problem of unemployment and to restore tranquillity throughout the country than anything else that could be done. How would the repeal of the eighteenth amendment relieve the present unemployment and economic condition existing throughout the country to-day? Does it not occur to you gentlemen that the reopening of the breweries would provide employment for several hundred thousand men who are to-day unemployed; it would automatically increase the purchasing power of labor as a whole. This is the primary reason for the position taken by the American Federation of Labor, which points out that reopened breweries would not only provide markets for goods and jobs for workers, but would send an electrical thrill through some 60 other industries.

Some of those who are advocating the repeal of the eighteenth amendment fear that, if modification should prevail and the sale of beer and light wines be permitted, a great many people would be satisfied with this and would lose their enthusiasm for repeal. On the other hand, I am of the opinion that if those who advocate repeal, block or attempt to block modification, they will arouse resentment among the modificationists to such a degree that they are likely to imperil the cause for which they are striving. It is my judgment that the sentiment for repeal is just as strong among those who are now working for modification as it is among those who are making the fight for straight-out repeal. These two elements have a common purpose, and it is my belief they would much better serve the ends of both if they would work together, thereby greatly strengthening the cause of both. In other words, our army should not be divided.

There is convincing evidence that millions upon millions of American citizens—I believe a very large majority—are opposed to national prohibition. It is my judgment, too, that a majority of the people of this country are in favor of a repeal of the prohibition amendment. Certainly it can not be successfully denied that the number of people who are opposed to the further unsuccessful attempt to fasten this unenforceable law upon all of the people is steadily growing.

By referenda and legislative resolutions, six States have petitioned for relief from the unpopular prohibition amendment. These States are Massachusetts, Rhode Island, New York, Illinois, Wisconsin, and Nevada. They have a total population of more than 28,000,000, or a little more than 25 per cent of the population of the entire country. Nine States have repudiated national prohibition either by refusing to ratify the eighteenth amendment or by their failure to adopt State enforcement acts or by the repeal of the State enforcement acts. These States are Massachusetts, Rhode Island, Connecticut, New York, Maryland, Illinois, Wisconsin, Montana, and Nevada. These nine States have a population of about 32,000,000, or about one-fourth the total population of the United States.

Two States—Wyoming and Connecticut—have recently taken steps for a referendum on prohibition next November. They would not have done this if there had not been within their borders marked dissatisfaction with the state of affairs under prohibition.

We can not escape the significance of many elections in 1930, and of special congressional elections since that time. In Ohio, for example, a wet Democrat, Senator BULKLEY, running against a dry Republican in a State normally Republican, polled a total of 1,046,561 votes to only 863,944 for his dry Republican opponent. In New Jersey, the late Senator Morrow, a wet, running against former Senator Frelinghuysen and Representative Fort, polled a total of 422,978 votes in the Republican primary, and was elected by an enormous majority. The total of 1,010,204 votes polled by the Democratic candidate for governor in Pennsylvania, John M. Hemphill, a wet, against Governor Pinchot, a dry Republican, also has its significance.

I may mention, too, that at their last meetings the American Bar Association and the American Legion went on record either for the repeal of the eighteenth amendment or its submission to the people for a referendum. It is also unnecessary to call to your attention the fact that while in 1928 not a single State political platform contained a repeal plank, in 1930 there were repeal planks in 21 State platforms. In the voluminous pages of the report of the Wickersham Commission there is to be found overwhelming evidence that the conditions which exist throughout the country have created a public demand for prompt relief.

It is my deliberate judgment not only that the "noble experiment" has been the most miserable fiasco in government within the history of our country, but that it has been the most costly. Prohibition, by constitutional mandate, is violative of the spirit in which the Constitution was written. It violates the theory of self-government. It destroys the principle of individual liberty. It takes away from the people the right to regulate their own affairs. But more than this, it is the most expensive experiment upon which our Government has ever embarked. It runs contrary to the law of economics and has placed an unjustified and almost unparalleled burden upon the already bent backs of the taxpayers.

The attempt to enforce this unpopular law upon the American people has cost the United States Treasury approximately $11,000,000,000 in lost revenue and enforcement costs.

From January, 1920, through the first half of 1931, appropriations for the attempted enforcement of prohibition approximated $375,000,000. These appropriations were for the Prohibition Unit directly, the Coast Guard, and for such other activities as have been conducted in the futile attempt to enforce this law. But this is only a small part of the cost to the Treasury. It covers only the direct outlay in appropriations. It is but a fraction of the total cost when we consider the loss of revenue to the Treasury in the failure to collect taxes on spirits and malt liquor.

At the time the prohibition amendment was adopted there remained but 15 wet States. Making due allowance for the increase in population since 1920, and basing the estimate on the amount of revenue the Government collected on liquor and beer sold in those States, we would now be collecting on the traffic in these 15 States more than $861,000,000 annually in Federal taxes. Thus, since January 1, 1920, we have lost in revenue twelve times $861,000,000, or a total of approximately $10,500,000,000. Allowing for the loss in revenue on wine, malt liquors, and spirits, and adding thereto the total of about $375,000,000 in direct appropriations, we have a total of approximately $11,000,000,000 which this so-called noble experiment has cost the Treasury of the United States. This sum is enough to pay all the ordinary operating expenses of the Federal Government for three years. It is four times the estimated Federal Treasury deficit at the close of the current fiscal year. It is three-fourths the amount of the gross public debt at the beginning of the last fiscal year, and equals the total of all the debts owing to the United States by the foreign governments at the close of 1931.

If the prohibition amendment were repealed, and the sale of wine, beer, and spirit liquors were resumed only in the 15 States that were wet when the eighteenth amendment was adopted, we would save not only more than eleven millions of dollars we are now asked to appropriate in a futile effort to enforce prohibition, but the Federal Treasury would be deriving in Federal revenue almost a billion dollars a year. With this revenue available, the puzzling problem of how to balance the Federal Budget would be quickly solved and it could be accomplished without a single increase in any present tax.

For the reasons I have given, I am strongly opposed to the item appropriating $11,369,000 for the continued futile attempt to enforce the unenforceable law. It is a senseless waste of money.

As one who favors the repeal of the eighteenth amendment, I have carefully read the provisions of the proposed Linthicum-Beck resolution and realize full well that many will immediately conclude that if this amendment is adopted it will mean the return of the old-time saloon. I do not concede this, but if it were true, I say I would much prefer that to the conditions of the present day, with all our beer-flats, speak-easies, and the carnival of crime we have witnessed throughout the entire country. These modern dens of vice, unregulated, and breeding places of crime, entice young people within their doors and start them upon their downward course. These, to me, are far worse than the old-time saloon ever was, and certainly incomparably worse than saloons would be today, because we have progressed very far in the last decade. If we had legalized saloons, to-day, they would have thrown about them such regulations by city and State laws that they would be very far superior to the beer-flats and speak-easies under prohibition. It was my observation, prior to the prohibition days, that bartenders did not permit minors to enter their doors or sell them anything to drink. Under prohibition, the speak-easies and bootleggers know no law. They sell even to children of grammar-school age and the stuff they sell is of such miserable concoction that it sometimes poisons even to the death.

An argument was advanced by some prohibitionist that the young would not drink, not having acquired the taste for intoxicating drinks. Formerly, young ladies would shun a young man who drank to excess; and a young man with a flask on his hip would be considered unfit to associate with. Under prohibition not only do they excuse the flask, but many of the same class of young ladies also drink strong liquor, whereas formerly they would have been subject to severe criticism at least for doing so. Now it is the common thing to do. Prohibition has given the flask and drinking by the young the badge of respectability and popularity. Not only this, but the young join their elders in their feeling of resentment against this unnatural and un-American law, and resentment also for those responsible for it. The question of prohibition is dividing our people as much as the slavery question did, and by many it is considered even worse, as it attacks personal rights and extends over the Nation, whereas the slavery question affected property rights and was sectional.

With the present unemployment and the general economic depression, I believe the time has come to display real leadership and to rise above selfish motives and settle this question upon its merits. Personally, I have three times tested the will of the people who comprise my constituency on the question of prohibition by advocating repeal of the eighteenth amendment, and on each occasion I have been elected to Congress by a larger majority than at the preceding election. I am convinced that good citizens everywhere are anxiously awaiting the day when the Membership of this House will show courage and good judgment by voting for a change, whether for outright repeal, for the settlement of the question on the principle of State rights, or for modification of the Volstead Act.

By a turn of the hand we can put into the United States Treasury about a billion dollars a year, and at a time when millions of men are walking the streets, their homes in jeopardy, their families without food, and all classes of taxpayers groaning under a burden of governmental costs they can not bear. By adopting this simple, wise, and just policy we would make it unnecessary to impose further crushing bureaucratic burdens on industry and taxpayers of all classes.

I am frank to state that unless we take advantage of this means of balancing the Budget, I think it is about time we handed this country back to the Indians with our apologies. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, for the information of the House, I will say some inaccuracies appear in some of the statements made as to the appropriation carried for the enforcement of the prohibition law. Some, it seems, have been informed that this is the only appropriation in the pending bill that has not been reduced. I will here insert that part of the committee's report relating to the appropriation for the enforcement of the prohibition law.

BUREAU OF PROHIBITION

This is the only item in the bill about which there was disagreement on the part of the subcommittee, and two members of the subcommittee felt that since it appears there will be an unobligated balance in the appropriation carried during the present fiscal year for this item, that the appropriation for 1933 should be reduced by the amount of such unexpended balance. The majority of the committee felt that as this appropriation is for the enforcement of a law which presents unusual difficulties at times in its enforcement, the appropriation should not be reduced. Similar action was taken by the committee for like reasons in the appropriations carried for the enforcement of antitrust laws and the immigration law, under each of which heads unobligated balances are shown for the present fiscal year.

Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MCREYNOLDS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that the committee having had under consideration the bill (H. R. 9349) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the Judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes, had come to no resolution thereon.

TRIBUTE TO THE LATE HON. PERCY QUIN

Mr. HALL of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, I attended, as one of the official committee appointed by the Speaker, the recent funeral of our deceased colleague, Hon. PERCY QUIN, of Mississippi. There were several beautiful and impressive tributes paid to his memory in the Baptist Church of McComb, Miss., Sunday morning, February 7, 1932, but none more beautiful and sincere than that uttered by my distinguished colleague from Alabama, Mr. HILL. I ask unanimous consent to insert in the RECORD as an extension of my remarks the beautiful tribute paid my deceased colleague by the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. HILL.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Mississippi?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to is as follows:

As a member of the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives, of which our friend was the able and beloved chairman, I want to speak just a word of tribute and of love. While the shadows were yet falling to the west, while still in love with life and filled with the ardor of a great task he slipped out of the company of living men and went home to God. As Horatio said of Hamlet, "Now cracks a noble heart." His was the heart of friendship, brave, generous, and true. He made no demands, needed no assurances, exacted no promises—he gave all in loyal, loving friendship. If everyone for whom he did some kindly deed were to bring a flower to his grave he would sleep to-night beneath a wilderness of flowers.

He loved his people, and he was ever the watchman on the tower guarding their interest. His people's welfare was the passion of his heart, and he had the courage to wage the battle, the courage to fight for the weak, the down-trodden, and the oppressed, the courage to do his duty regardless of the consequences, the courage to stand fast by the perfect truth, the absolute right, the unsurrendered and unsurrenderable ideal, and to know that one upon the side of God is a majority. He set the example and lifted high the light of service for the guidance of our feet.

There was no Member of the House of Representatives more beloved by his colleagues than he. When the word went out that he was to speak the Members rushed to their seats to hear him. With his quaint and inimitable humor he shook them with laughter and then with the fervor of his earnestness and the eloquence of his sincerity he moved them to tears. In his passing Mississippi, land of Davis, of Lamar, of George, of Walthall, has lost one of her strong, noble sons, the Nation one of her ablest and most faithful representatives, and the people one of their bravest and best friends.

We loved him living; we love him now. In parting we say, Good night, sweet friend, may flights of angels sing thee to thy rest.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, may I have the attention of the majority and minority leaders in bringing to the attention of the House at this time a tentative understanding that we hope the House will give approval to. This understanding has been reached tentatively with representative Members on both sides of the aisle in reference to the further consideration of the pending bill. The gentleman from Pennsylvania and I are in agreement that on tomorrow the House will meet at 12 o'clock and that the gentleman from Pennsylvania and I (one or both) will then discuss the provisions of the bill, and it is our expectation that the reading of the bill under the 5-minute rule will commence about 1 o'clock or soon thereafter; and, further, since there has been expression from both sides of the aisle of interest in the appropriation for the enforcement of the prohibition law, it has been tentatively agreed between the gentleman from Pennsylvania and myself that when that item in the bill is reached, it will be passed over until Tuesday, with the understanding we will ask the House to limit the discussion of that item to two hours, one-half of the time to be used by those for and one-half of the time by those against, and this is to include all discussion of any amendments that may be offered thereto.

Mr. SNELL. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. SNELL. What is the plan or program for Monday's session? Has the gentleman talked that over with the majority leader?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. My understanding is that it is the purpose of the majority leader to recess until 2.30 on Monday. We will then again take up this bill under the 5-minute rule, and if the item to which I have referred is reached before Tuesday it will be passed over, to be returned to and disposed of on Tuesday, if the discussion is limited to two hours by the House.

I ask unanimous consent that this understanding which I have outlined be approved and authorized by the House.

The SPEAKER. If the Chair understands, the gentleman asks unanimous consent that general debate on this bill be limited to one hour and a half to-morrow.

Mr. OLIVER. Not exceeding one hour and a half, and to be confined to the bill.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I have made the statement with the consent of the majority and minority leaders, and I ask unanimous consent that when we come to the item of the appropriation for enforcement of the prohibition law that it go over until Tuesday; that there then be two hours of general debate on that paragraph and all amendments thereto, one-half to be controlled by those for and one-half by those against.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent that when the paragraph relating to the enforcement of prohibition is reached, that it shall go over until Tuesday; that there shall be two hours of debate on that paragraph and all amendments thereto, one-half to be controlled by those for and one-half by those against. Is there objection?

Mr. BOYLAN. Reserving the right to object, do I understand that the total time to be devoted to the prohibition paragraph and all amendments is to be two hours?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. BOYLAN. Does the gentleman think that is sufficient time?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I have been informed by those against the proposed appropriation that such time will be satisfactory. It was suggested by them, and agreed to by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STRONG] and myself, subject to the approval of the House.

Mr. SIMMONS. Reserving the right to object, in view of the fact that we are proceeding under the 5-minute rule for extension of time, it ought to be understood that the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union should recognize, alternately for five minutes each, gentlemen who are opposed to the proposition and those for the proposition, so that there will be no question as to control of the time.

The SPEAKER. The Chairman undoubtedly will control it. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Alabama?

There was no objection.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 20, 1932

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The Chaplain, Rev. James Shera Montgomery, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Thou ever-blessed God, our lives are filled with strange questions and mysteries. We pray to-day that Thou wilt sweep away the lore of wonder and make the obscure plain until it blossoms with rest and contentment. As Thy command and our obligations are universal, enable us to rise, and do Thou lead the way into that chamber of our souls where goodness dominates, where wisdom is supernal, where strength is divine, and where we are blessed and encouraged by the fruits of the Spirit. Take our many faculties, our intellects, our moral and social natures, and harmonize them with the universal law of love and brotherhood. Then, Heavenly Father, the poor will no longer despise the rich and the rich will no longer look with contempt upon the poor, for such an overflow of God in the soul is the most beautiful flower of Christian knighthood. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

A message from the Senate by Mr. Craven, its principal clerk, announced that the Senate had passed, with an amendment in which the concurrence of the House is requested, a bill of the House of the following title:

H. R. 9203. An act to improve the facilities of the Federal reserve system for the service of commerce, industry, and agriculture, to provide means for meeting the needs of member banks in exceptional circumstances, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate insists upon its amendments to said bill, requests a conference with the House thereon, and appoints Mr. WALCOTT, Mr. TOWNSEND, and Mr. GLASS to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the House is requested, the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 292) to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to aid in the establishment of agricultural credit corporations, and for other purposes; insists upon its amendment to said joint resolution, requests a conference with the House thereon, and appoints Mr. NORRIS, Mr. MCNARY, and Mr. SMITH to be the conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the President pro tempore, in accordance with the provisions of House Concurrent Resolution No. 19, had appointed the Senator from Virginia, Mr. GLASS, to place, on behalf of the Senate, a wreath on the grave of Mary, mother of Washington, at Fredericksburg, Va., on February 22, 1932.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting therein four short poems, one about Mary, the mother of Washington, and three others about George Washington.

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, although all this is very nice, I feel that the RECORD is no place for poems. If we permit this, we would have all the poets in the country trying to get into the RECORD. I object.

ORDER OF BUSINESS

Mr. SNELL. Mr. Speaker, may I have the attention of the majority leader for a moment? Last evening when there were very few Members present I agreed to a unanimous-consent request that when the House recess next Monday we would come together again at 2.30 o'clock p. m. Since that time a great many Members have been to me and have expressed the thought that we ought not to meet again on Monday afternoon, because it is a general holiday and so much going on in other places that it would be better if we did not come together until the following Tuesday noon. I rise to put that matter up to the majority leader.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, in order to put the matter up to the House I shall submit a resolution. I think if George Washington were alive and here next Monday he would feel that this Congress should go ahead and attend to business, commencing at 2.30 o'clock in the afternoon, rather than adjourn. If the gentleman wants to take the responsibility of stopping the business on that day, very well.

Mr. SNELL. Oh, no; that is not my attitude. I merely want to bring the matter up for consideration.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, I offer the following resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

House Resolution 154

Resolved, That at the conclusion of the exercises arranged by the joint committee pursuant to the provisions of House Concurrent Resolution 4 and the House Concurrent Resolution 12 on Monday, February 22, 1932, the Speaker shall declare the House to be in recess until 2.30 o'clock p. m.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the resolution.

The resolution was agreed to.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. UNDERHILL. Mr. Speaker, it is quite evident that the purpose of the gentleman is to read these poems he referred to a moment ago. With all of the business that we have before us, I feel impelled to object.

Mr. BOYLAN. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BOYLAN. My inquiry is to ask, through the Speaker, whether the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. UNDERHILL] is a psychic or a mind reader.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can not answer that question.

GAG RULE

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I may be privileged to address the House for 20 minutes right now.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

[Applause.]

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, for nearly 10 years now I have been in association with the membership of this House. I have heard men stand here and sing swan songs, asserting the vast sacrifice they had made by service here. Mr. Speaker, it has been no sacrifice on my part. It has been the proudest privilege which might have been conferred upon me to be in touch both mentally and physically with the magnificent characters I have met here. For the moment, Mr. Speaker, I want to express the desire which has been uppermost in my thought ever since I came here, and that is, if I could not win the applause, then that I might win the respect of my every colleague.

In recent days I have been taking an attitude here greatly out of the ordinary, and I am offering a plea now that every Member of the House may be kind enough to put himself in my place before he shall censure me for my attitude. For nearly 10 years I have stood here and proclaimed, in my feeble way as best I could, against the operation of the gag-rule system as practiced for long years by the Mellonites in control of this House. Will any friend ask me now to stultify myself by remaining silent when that which I condemned in Mellonites is practiced by Democrats? I think not. I have been distressed beyond words sometimes at the attitude of the House as at present organized in following so closely along the lines followed by my Mellonite friends throughout the years. I think so much of many of my colleagues over on the other side that I should perhaps make a distinction between a Mellonite and a Republican, and I withdraw the former appellation as to some of you. In recent days we have seen legislation brought in under suspension of the rules, with no opportunity at all to offer an amendment, no opportunity at all to read the legislation until it came directly to the time for consideration. That is what I call gag rule. I do not like it. I do not think anyone else likes it. Then, let me call attention to another situation, and that is the frame of mind which is engendered by obedience to the gag-rule system.

You will recall that when we were discussing a few days ago the bill known as the Steagall bill we were brazenly informed, when we asked for testimony given by a certain gentleman in the hearing, that that was not good for us, and we did not get it. The same gentleman expressed great fear that if the average Member of this House should know what the spokesman knew, if the average Member should know what some member of the committee knew, the world might be turned upside down before breakfast. Ah, my friends, that is a pretty low estimate of the character of the average Member of this House, and I resent it. Oh, I wish that the average Member among us could utterly divest himself of that hideous thing called fear. I remember when we were discussing, some years ago, the Italian debt settlement there were some learned commissioners here from Italy. We were talking about the ability of Italy to pay.

I remember a dear old colleague of ours, now gone to his reward, who was one of the fearful kind, and he boldly expressed the fear that there might be international complications before night if the membership of this House should be permitted to know what he knew about statements made by Mussolini's commissioners at that moment in Washington. I recall that at that time, having great respect for the elderly gentleman who made that statement, I did not reply other than to tell him a little story which I thought would illustrate the utter needlessness of entertaining fear. I do know how better I might now appeal to my colleagues who are afraid to permit common Members of this House to know what uncommon Members know than by repeating that story. Parky Doody was a professional horse trader.

He lived in a little village near my home town. He was the best horse trader in the State. He admitted it. For the information of younger gentlemen here, and all ladies, I will say that in that day it was the practice of the professional horse traders to get together a great band of decrepit horses, usually a few racers, a few fighting cocks, and perhaps a bulldog and travel about the country very much like a circuit rider, appearing at each place at regular intervals. One day, along to this village where Parky lived, came a new band of horse traders. At their head was a Hebrew brother. Parky and the leader of the band jockeyed around all afternoon trying to make a horse trade, and in the evening the trade was made. The next morning even the little boys on the street laughed at Parky because they had heard their elders say he had been unmercifully worsted in the trade. Parky's pride was hurt. He resolved then and there to get even. He knew that these travelers would return to his village 30 days hence, so he began laying his plans. But about 10 days before the travelers were expected to return a couple of missionary priests came along and began holding a mission in the little parish church. Parky was attending the mission. He was trying to be good. He wanted to be good, but he could not forget he had to get even with that Hebrew brother. So the night before the travelers were expected to return Parky went over to the priest's house. He called the father out on the porch where none other could hear. He said, "Father, I have a question to ask, and upon your answer depends ever and ever so much to me." The father was alarmed, and he said, "What is it, Parky?" Parky said, "Father, would it be a sin to cheat a Jew?" The father said, "Why, Parky, of course it would. Why do you ask such a foolish question?" Parky again asked, "Would it be the same sin to cheat a Jew that it would to cheat a Christian?" The father replied in the same manner. Parky started to go away, his head hanging down, looking very disconsolate. The father called him to return, and putting his arm around his back and patting him on the shoulder, he said, "Parky, I would not worry about it; it won't happen." [Laughter.]

Now, the next time our fearful brothers come to us, fearful that if we knew what they know about the testimony of General Dawes, deleted or in its full profane regalia, let them remember the story of Parky Doody.

Friends, I do not know who has been responsible for the bringing of the system of gag rule among us in recent days. I cast no aspersions in any direction; but, one thing I do know, and that is that this magnificent Speaker of yours and mine has had nothing to do with the promotion of the gag-rule principle here in this House. [Applause.]

Many, many times in the darkening day, on many and many an occasion during the tired evening hours when I had been contending as earnestly and ably as I knew how against the practice of the infamous system of gag rules by the Mellonite controllers——

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Oh, certainly.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Can the gentleman from Nebraska inform the House who applied the gag rule on the Veterans' Committee during the present session of Congress?

Mr. HOWARD. The gentleman well knows himself that I protested against anything of the kind.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Then the gentleman admits it has been applied by somebody, does he not?

Mr. HOWARD. Applied by every Mellonite organization since I have been here. [Applause.] The gentleman, as one member of that committee, knows that I protested all the time. The gentleman knows that I protested a couple of weeks ago on the same line and told this entire committee I would protest, even on the floor of the House, against that gag rule, even though it might be invoked in behalf of almost sacred legislation.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I am glad the gentleman said that, because it is true that he did protest, but it brings out the fact that the Democrats, under this leadership, have invoked the gag rule.

Mr. HOWARD. My dear fellow, that is just what I am stating, and against which I am protesting.

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Not until I have finished with the gentleman from South Dakota. I am excoriating Democrats now for the damnable practice of emulating the Mellonites. [Applause.]

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman now yield?

Mr. HOWARD. Yes.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Nebraska well knows that during the entire service of the gentleman from South Dakota as chairman of the Veterans' Committee every bill he brought upon this floor was brought in under a rule where you could not change the dotting of an "i" or the crossing of a "t," where it had to be swallowed under 20 minutes of debate to a side, and where the membership did not have the right to impress upon that legislation its own desires. The gentleman well knows that was the kind of gag rule which has gotten into the system of the gentleman from Nebraska until he still believes it exists here on the floor, when it does not now exist. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. Will the gentleman yield for a further question?

Mr. HOWARD. I will yield; but let me remind the gentleman that my little 20 minutes are fleeting.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. I would say that I know the gentleman from Texas would not deliberately misrepresent the facts, but he must recall, although he might not have been present on the floor, that when the last veterans' bill—the so-called Rankin bill, from which I took my name, because I did not believe in it after it had been changed by the House—was brought into the House, we had four or five days of debate here, and every amendment possible, including the Cochran and Connery amendments, were considered.

Mr. BLANTON. That was not the gentleman's bill, because he took his name off of it. And that was the bill, I will state to my friend, that passed this House almost unanimously; there were only about 6 votes in the Senate against it, and yet when it went to the White House it was vetoed and brought back here. Then the gentleman and his party killed it and substituted for it another gag-rule bill, passed under a rule, with 20 minutes debate to the side, allowing no amendments to be offered to it.

Mr. JOHNSON of South Dakota. My object in answering the gentleman was to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that he misstated the facts when he said the gentleman from South Dakota had brought all veterans' legislation into this House under a gag rule, when the gentleman from South Dakota did no such thing.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman did not "bring" that bill here. He did not sponsor it. He took his name off of it and had it called the "Rankin" bill, which passed overwhelmingly, and then when it was vetoed and killed the gentleman did substitute for it a gag bill passed under gag rule.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Nebraska has the floor.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. Speaker, I am being more or less spoliated. [Laughter.] Now, my friends, I want to return to the statement I started to make when I was interrupted. I have said that this magnificent Speaker of yours and mine has damned on many occasions the Mellonite gag-rule system—damned it to as hot a place in the hottest corner of tradition's hottest hell as even the lurid language of Charley Dawes could consign it.

Oh, gentlemen, you remember how nobly JOHN GARNER stood here and pleaded with the House against the gag-rule system practiced in the Committee on Ways and Means during the last session. My friends, many and many an evening time, in the tired hours, after a day of denunciation of the gag-rule system, I remember that dear JOHN

GARNER would come to me, put his arm around me lovingly, like a brother, pat me on the shoulder, and say: "Do not worry about it, old Roman. There may come a day when we will control this House [laughter and applause] and in that day this damnable Mellonite practice will be no longer permitted."

If it is true, and possibly it is, that there has been some practice of it here recently, my main plea is that all of you and the country believe that poor JOHN GARNER, sitting here with a bare majority of only 2 or 3, and some of us rather uncertain at that [laughter], is doing the very best he can under the circumstances. In the half minute left to me I just want to say, with reference to my anti-gag-rule Speaker, God bless him! [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

ECONOMY COMMITTEE

Mr. POU, from the Committee on Rules, presented the following privileged report from that committee, which was referred to the House Calendar and ordered printed:

REPORT NO. 586

The Committee on Rules having had under consideration House Resolution 151, reports the same to the House with an amendment striking out all of the preamble, with the recommendation that the amendment be agreed to and that the resolution as so amended be adopted.

AGRICULTURAL CREDIT CORPORATIONS

Mr. JONES. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 292) to authorize the Secretary of Agriculture to aid in the establishment of agricultural credit corporations, and for other purposes, with a Senate amendment, disagree to the Senate amendment, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 292), with a Senate amendment, disagree to the Senate amendment, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. JONES, FULMER, and HAUGEN.

IMPROVEMENT OF FACILITIES OF THE FEDERAL RESERVE SYSTEM

Mr. STEAGALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. 9203) to improve the facilities of the Federal reserve system for the service of commerce, industry, and agriculture, to provide means for meeting the needs of member banks in exceptional circumstances, and for other purposes, with Senate amendments, disagree to the Senate amendments, and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Alabama asks unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill H. R. 9203, with a Senate amendment, disagree to the Senate amendment, and ask for a conference. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and appoints the following conferees: Messrs. STEAGALL, BRAND of Georgia, STEVENSON, MCFADDEN, and STRONG of Kansas.

SAN CARLOS (WHITE MOUNTAIN) INDIAN RESERVATION, ARIZ.

Mr. DOUGLAS of Arizona. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of a resolution which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

House Resolution 155

Resolved, That the Senate be requested to return to the House of Representatives the bill (H. R. 8824) entitled "An act to restore certain lands to the San Carlos (White Mountain) Indian Reservation, Ariz."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Arizona?

There was no objection.

The resolution was agreed to.

THE LIBEL SUIT OF CANNON AGAINST TINKHAM

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes in reply to certain statements made on the floor in reference to me yesterday.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent to address the House for 15 minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, certain remarks made by the honorable Representative from Texas, Mr. BLANTON, have been brought to my attention. He made them yesterday in reference to a suit for libel now pending between Bishop James Cannon, jr., and myself in the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia. I do not think it important at all that I should reply, but just for the RECORD I want to say a few words in relation to the questions concerning the pleadings in the case to which he referred. I think the best way to proceed is for me to read my answer in the suit:

IN THE SUPREME COURT OF THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA

James Cannon, jr., plaintiff, v. George Holden Tinkham, defendant.
At Law No. 79715

Now comes the defendant and for pleas in the above-entitled cause says:

(1) That he is a Member of the Congress of the United States from the State of Massachusetts and that he has been a Member of the Congress since March 4, 1915;

(2) That on June 21, 1930, he made the following statement:

"Lest Bishop Cannon shall delude his followers into thinking the charges which I made against him in the House of Representatives were unfounded, and meeting his challenge that I divest myself of my congressional immunity, I desire to restate over my signature the charges I made in the House of Representatives that he is a shameless violator of the Federal corrupt practices act, a criminal statute; that he received $65,300, mostly in cash, from a New York capitalist, Mr. Jameson, during the 1928 elections and illegally concealed the receipt of all of this money until February 15, 1929, and has not yet accounted for $48,300 of this amount, refusing to do so before the Senate lobby investigating committee, before which he appeared voluntarily, and where he was under oath and could have been cross-examined."

(3) That such statement was a statement of fact, and true, and that it was a privileged statement;

(4) That he was not actuated by malice, but, on the contrary, that he was actuated by a sense of high public duty to expose the true character of the plaintiff; and

(5) That he denies each and every other allegation of the plaintiff and leaves the plaintiff to his proof.

GEORGE HOLDEN TINKHAM, pro se.

Mr. Speaker, I thought when I drew this answer that it was simple and direct. It pleaded, first, truth, and, second, privilege, but you will note that it did not say congressional privilege or congressional immunity. The usual defenses in pleadings in all libel actions are truth and privilege. Privilege in a libel action, on the part of the defense, grows out of the character of the parties to the suit or of the character of the statement that is made or of the circumstances in which the statement is made, and when this plea was drawn—and it was drawn by me—it was meant simply to raise such general privileges as can be raised in an action for libel.

I stated in my plea that it was a privileged statement after admitting that I had divested myself of my congressional immunity when I made the statement upon which was based the libel action, and I want it distinctly understood that I did not raise the question of congressional privilege or the question of congressional immunity in my plea but merely the general principle of privilege which is accorded to anyone filing an answer to an action for libel.

Now, it so happens that in this District it is necessary to set out what privilege is relied upon. This I did not do, and therefore the attorney for Bishop Cannon took advantage of this situation—and I am not blaming him at all for it—and went to the court and filed a demurrer, which in this District is called a motion to strike, saying I should set up what privilege or privileges I relied upon.

Then I turned the case over to an attorney who was more familiar with the pleadings in this District than I was. I understand from the honorable Representative from Texas that my attorney did raise some question in relation to congressional privilege. It was the first time that I knew he had, and, as far as I was concerned, I made no suggestion of that character to him.

The court decided that in my plea the character of privilege upon which I relied should be set up, and my attorney has filed pleas which, I understand, the plaintiff's attorney has accepted as being sufficient to make the case ripe for trial.

In these pleas my attorney did not invoke congressional privilege. How could he, as a matter of law, after I had waived congressional privilege in the statement upon which I am being sued?

Mr. BLANTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TINKHAM. I yield to the honorable gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Massachusetts is a graduate of one of the leading law schools of the United States, is he not?

Mr. TINKHAM. I attended the Harvard Law School.

Mr. BLANTON. And the gentleman is a practicing attorney in Massachusetts.

Mr. TINKHAM. I was up to 18 years ago, when I came here.

Mr. BLANTON. Being so, he started out and filed pro se a plea setting up the fact that he was a Congressman representing the people of Massachusetts in the United States House of Representatives, did he not?

Mr. TINKHAM. That is what I said.

Mr. BLANTON. Then he pleaded privilege, did he not?

Mr. TINKHAM. Yes; I said it was a privileged statement.

Mr. BLANTON. And the only thing the attorneys for Bishop Cannon did was to move to strike out that one sentence.

Mr. TINKHAM. True.

Mr. BLANTON. And the gentleman's lawyers came back and pleaded that you had filed it yourself, and had inadvertently so drawn it.

Mr. TINKHAM. I do not know. I have no evidence of that.

Mr. BLANTON. And your lawyers said that you could not waive it, that the Constitution had so surrounded Congressmen with protection that you could not waive it.

Mr. TINKHAM. They may have argued that, but they did not put it into any plea.

Mr. BLANTON. Did they not put it into an amended plea?

Mr. TINKHAM. No; not as I understand it.

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman is very kind to yield, and I appreciate it. Is not it a fact that in this morning's paper the gentleman gave the press his picture—which is a splendid picture [laughter]—and a statement that he was filing to-day a new plea waiving all immunity; did he not give that statement to the press?

Mr. TINKHAM. No. I gave no statement to the press except the speech I made on the floor day before yesterday, which the honorable gentleman from Texas commented upon yesterday.

Mr. BLANTON. That was given out "for release on delivery," was it not?

Mr. TINKHAM. That is true; and I meant it to be published. [Laughter.]

Mr. BLANTON. The gentleman from Massachusetts will be fair to a man who can not speak from this forum. Will not the gentleman be fair enough to explain about the newspaper reports that the court, after the hearing of the indictment which the gentleman's energy has been instrumental in getting the court and grand jury to indict the bishop—did not the court say that there was no charge of violating the law against Bishop Cannon?

Mr. TINKHAM. Of which case is the honorable Representative speaking—the civil case against me for libel or the criminal case against Bishop Cannon for violations of the Federal corrupt practices act?

Mr. BLANTON. Did not the gentleman help to get an indictment against Bishop Cannon?

Mr. TINKHAM. I helped in no way.

Mr. BLANTON. Did not the gentleman help to influence it?

Mr. TINKHAM. I helped in no way. I think it is a very improper thing for the honorable Representative from Texas to suggest that I attempted to influence a grand jury in the performance of its duty.

Mr. BLANTON. What is the purpose of the gentleman in making all these speeches in the newspapers and from this forum about a law case that ought to be tried in court?

Mr. TINKHAM. My purpose is to bring first to the attention of this House——

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MICHENER. Is it permissible for a witness to leave the stand and the cross-examining attorney to approach within striking distance of the witness?

Mr. BLANTON. Certainly it is permissible.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts addressed the House, and if he yields to the gentleman from Texas and gives the gentleman from Texas all the time he wishes that is his privilege. The gentleman from Massachusetts has the floor.

Mr. BLANTON. May I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if he did not say in his speech the day before yesterday that he went before the Caraway committee and lodged all these facts against the bishop, and that he tried to get the Caraway committee to take action against him?

Mr. TINKHAM. I did not. Let us be exact.

Mr. BLANTON. What did he say?

Mr. TINKHAM. I say to the honorable Representative from Texas, without offense, that I never have met a man in my life whose brain receiving a straight statement could reproduce it distorted in so fantastic a way.

Mr. BLANTON. I am just referring to the English language. The gentleman did appear before the Caraway committee, did he not?

Mr. TINKHAM. Let me make a statement as to the exact facts. I appeared before the Caraway committee.

Mr. BLANTON. For what purpose?

Mr. TINKHAM. To make general charges against a number of ecclesiastical organizations that in my opinion were violating the old American principle of separation of church and state. During the time that I was before the committee, and only for two or three minutes, I brought to the attention of the committee the fact that Bishop Cannon's committee—that is, his political committee—had reported $17,000 as having been received from one Jameson, and that Mr. Jameson had stated before another committee that he had given Bishop Cannon $65,300.

Mr. BLANTON. Is the gentleman willing for me to put Mr. Jameson's testimony in the RECORD?

Mr. TINKHAM. Wait a moment. I asked the committee to investigate that discrepancy, and that is all that I did.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it not a fact that Judge Gordon, who sustained Bishop Cannon's motion to strike out the gentleman's plea of privilege, is a fundamental wet himself?

Mr. TINKHAM. I know nothing about his position on that question, absolutely nothing.

Mr. BLANTON. Is it not a fact that the judge in sustaining the demurrer to the indictment held that there was not a single thing in there that showed a violation of law?

Mr. TINKHAM. I do not think he did that.

Mr. BLANTON. Who is it that is having the district attorney appeal from that judgment of the court? I am interested in knowing that. Why does not the district attorney accept that judgment, that that indictment is not good, and why does he want to appeal it and cause further expense to the people of the District?

Mr. TINKHAM. If he thinks that Bishop Cannon is guilty, it is his duty to appeal the decision, and he certainly would not have brought the case before the grand jury unless he thought he was guilty.

Mr. BLANTON. Then the gentleman approves of his action in appealing?

Mr. TINKHAM. Certainly. I believe this case ought to be carried to its end.

Mr. BLANTON. Is the gentleman not backing up the district attorney in his appeal?

Mr. TINKHAM. I have done nothing in relation to the district attorney.

Mr. BLANTON. Then, the gentleman is willing for the district attorney to drop it and stop costing the people money?

Mr. TINKHAM. No; I am not.

The SPEAKER. The time of the gentleman from Massachusetts has expired.

STATE, JUSTICE, COMMERCE, AND LABOR APPROPRIATION BILL

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 9349) making appropriations for the Departments of State and Justice and for the judiciary, and for the Departments of Commerce and Labor, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1933, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 9349, with Mr. McREYNOLDS in the chair.

The Clerk read the title of the bill.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama rose.

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I yield to the gentleman from Alabama such time as he desires.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama is recognized for one hour.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I am sure it would be more interesting to the visitors if field day in no man's land could continue, but there comes a time when Congress must give very serious attention to privileged bills which seek to provide funds for carrying on essential activities of the Government. I will say that the RECORDS of yesterday, the day before, and to-day are well worth keeping, because there can be found in the RECORDS of those three days some very instructive data and information, interestingly told, relating to a great number of subjects now engaging public attention.

We will now return to the consideration of the pending appropriation bill, and it has been the practice of the Committee on Appropriations, as well as the Members of the House, to forget politics in the consideration of all such bills.

In presenting the recommendations of the committee I feel sure I will meet with a fine spirit of cooperation on the part of the House to effect all possible economies in government if good reasons can be assigned therefor. I wish to make grateful acknowledgment to the members of the subcommittee who assisted in preparing the recommendations set out in the pending bill for their very helpful and splendid cooperation, to the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN], to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CANNON], to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHREVE], and to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM]. I am sure other committee members will permit me to express my especial appreciation to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHREVE], the former chairman of the subcommittee, for his very helpful assistance. The committee wishes me to thank our efficient clerk, Mr. Bob Nagle, for his invaluable aid.

I pause here long enough to pay brief tribute to one of our departed colleagues who, because of his long successful business life and his extensive travel, both at home and abroad, was so well equipped as to effectively aid the committee in its deliberations. Congressman Ackerman, to whom I refer, was an indefatigable worker and a valuable member of our committee from the day of its formation in 1921 to the time of his death in 1931. He spent much of his time in and out of Congress in seeking first-hand information as to the working of the four governmental units which our committee had to deal with, and I know I express the sentiments of all my colleagues on that committee in saying that his passing was a great loss, not only to Congress but to our country as well.

Those of you, who served with him, will remember that he always manifested a keen interest in the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, and during his membership on the committee it was his unvarying, unfailing custom, in connection with a bill like the one now pending, to make a statement of the real accomplishment of that bureau. As a tribute to his memory, our committee wish to carry on this worthwhile work of his, and I shall later insert a statement following the general lines in which he presented to the House every year the activities of this bureau.

It is pleasing to be able to say that the subcommittee was in full agreement as to all items in the pending bill, except one, and our differences as to that will be the subject of discussion on next Tuesday. So far as the other recommendations of the bill are concerned, the subcommittee and the full committee were in complete agreement, I think.

Let us consider for a moment what the action of the Committee on Appropriations, interpreted in dollars and cents, means. This bill carries appropriations for four departments of the Government—State, Justice, Commerce, and Labor—and on page 1 of the report will be found a table showing that the appropriations for 1932 for those four departments were $139,001,704.34 and that the Budget estimate for 1933 for these same departments was $129,784,136.89. When the departments are separately examined it appears that the appropriations for the Department of State were reduced by the Bureau of the Budget about $1,792,000 for the fiscal year 1933 under 1932. When, however, it is recalled that there were many nonrecurring items in 1932—that is to say, items for which no appropriations are carried in 1933, amounting to about $2,374,015—it will be seen that the Bureau of the Budget really gave to the Department of State an increase over 1932 of $600,000 or more.

It further appears from mere figures that appropriations for the Department of Commerce was reduced by the Bureau of the Budget about $9,000,000, yet when we take into account the nonrecurring items of 1932, which do not appear in the 1933 bill, we find that the cut for the Department of Commerce is less than $700,000.

The Committee on Appropriations reduced the estimate of the Bureau of the Budget for the State Department $1,492,212.77, and reduced the estimate of the Bureau of the Budget for the Department of Commerce $586,447. There was a substantial increase given to the Department of Justice by the Bureau of the Budget, and the Appropriations Committee have reduced the Budget estimates for the Department of Justice $3,149,089, and for the Department of Labor $155,070 under the Budget estimate, making the total cut by the Appropriations Committee under the estimates of the Bureau of the Budget of $5,382,818.77 for these four departments.

Perhaps I might here say that your committee spent more than six weeks in its study and preparation of this bill, and in order that we might have some sound basis on which to predicate our study we secured charts of all the activities of those four departments. First, a chart of the departmental breakdown and then charts of the breakdowns of each separate unit in the four departments. For instance, take the Department of State, which is the first department appropriated for in the pending bill; it has about 35 main bureaus or units in the department at Washington with more than 800 employees. It maintains 59 diplomatic missions and 342 consular offices abroad, with more than 4,000 employees. Fifty-five foreign governments are represented in diplomatic missions in the United States and its territories, and they maintain 1,174 foreign consular offices in our country and its territories.

These charts give you a mental picture of the many units through which the Department of State functions.

I call attention to these charts for this reason, that under the classification law it will be found we have rapidly drifted into a government of single ideas, where no employee is supposed to do, too often, but one single thing. It is very easy, with the classifications that have been established, to bring strong pressure upon the several departments to establish separate units or bureaus, so that there may be numerous bureau chiefs and assistant bureau chiefs, with salaries altogether out of proportion to that of the real workers in the bureau.

That is one of the errors that sooner or later this Congress must correct. It is largely a fundamental error of existing law, which, I feel, needs study in connection with what this Congress may provide for in consolidating separate Government activities, so as to avoid duplications.

The same thing occurs in the Department of Commerce. We find they also have a very ambitious set-up in their department at Washington. The chart shows the innumerable breakdowns of these departments into separate units. If the Members are interested further in the study of these maps and charts which are here exhibited they can be found in the Appropriations Committee room.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Do I understand that all of this condition, to which the gentleman has referred, is a matter of law and not of administration?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. It is largely a matter of administration.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I understood the gentleman to say it was a matter of law.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I said there is a classification act which furnishes a great temptation to all departments to yield to entreaties of their employees to establish many separate units and place over such units bureau chiefs and assistant bureau chiefs. I feel that is a matter that needs correction.

You will find on this map prepared by the State Department the locations of our embassies, legations, and other Foreign Service posts. Our 59 diplomatic embassies and 342 consular offices will be found widely scattered throughout the world. We have here an insert map which gives more clearly to the eye where these positions are located in European countries. This map will also be on file in the Appropriations Committee room for the information of the House.

Now, coming to the appropriations carried for the State Department, as I stated, the bill will soon be read under the 5-minute rule, and the committee will be pleased to answer inquiries as to all of the many separate items for which appropriations are carried. I thought, however, it might be interesting to call to your attention some of the outstanding reductions appearing on pages 6 and 7 of the report. You might be interested, for instance, in the fund that has been carried for a long while of $400,000 and known as the emergency fund to meet emergencies arising in the Diplomatic and Consular Service. For reasons which the committee felt were sound, we cut that from $400,000 to $200,000.

Take the item for post allowances to Foreign Service officers, which is a fund that has been distributed by the Secretary of State for the purpose of supplementing the pay of some Foreign Service officers at different posts. We cut that from $100,000 to $50,000, for reasons fully set out in the report, and which we think the House will approve.

With reference to the Foreign Service building fund, you will recall that Congress in 1926 authorized $10,000,000 to be expended in the purchase of sites and in the construction of buildings thereon for the Foreign Service. It was intended, as far as possible, that the commission would build what might be known as combination buildings suitable for both residential and office purposes, so that not only the State Department and the Commerce Department might be housed therein, but also all other Government departments that might have representatives in the foreign field. There has been appropriated under that authorization $8,835,000, leaving a balance of $1,165,000 unappropriated. Mr. Merrill, the very capable secretary of the commission, has submitted a very complete report, which will be found in the hearings on page 431 et seq.

You will note that this map indicates where we own sites improved and unimproved in foreign countries. In other words, black represents sites on which are buildings, and it will be noted they are well scattered. There are 24 sites on which there are buildings now occupied by Government offices. There are five in yellow where we own sites on which we are now constructing buildings, and on one of which is a fine office building in the city of Paris.

The green represents sites for which plans are now being drawn for buildings to be erected in the future. All of the sites shown have been paid for except the one at Rome, on which we owe about $1,000,000, but for which the commission has sufficient money already appropriated. The yellow, seven in number, represents sites for which no plans have been drawn or are being contemplated at present.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Do I understand that these buildings are outside the appropriations for the embassies we now have?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. No. These buildings are for that purpose.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. Our ambassadors are housed in these buildings?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Not in all of them but in some of them.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I recall that the Committees on Foreign Affairs had their members go to inspect these buildings.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The chairmen of the Foreign Affairs Committees of the House and the Senate, as well as the ranking minority members of the two committees, are members of the Foreign Building Commission, as the gentleman may remember.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I was anxious to know whether these buildings are in addition to those?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. No. Some of these buildings have been built by that commission and many sites have been purchased by the commission, but some of the sites and buildings here shown were owned before that commission was formed in 1926.

However, the commission, under that act, has charge of all these buildings and sites. All previous acts were repealed, and all of our foreign building program placed in charge of this commission. Some of this construction had been authorized prior to the organization of that commission, and the commission carried forward the work under the act of its creation.

Following this you will find the item of representation allowances. There has been some discussion of this, you will remember, in the past two years in the House. There had never been any appropriation for this purpose up to two years ago. The first appropriation carried was $92,000, which was later increased to $125,000. The committee reduced this appropriation to $25,000 and suggests that instead of making allotments in advance from this fund that it be considered hereafter as a fund from which the Secretary of State is authorized to refund money to foreign officers who have had unusual expenses and to which, in the judgment of the Secretary of State, the National Government should make some contribution.

The other item you would likely be interested in is that covering rent, heat, fuel, and light in the Foreign Service, on page 7. This carries a proviso which seeks to limit the amount that may be spent for heat, light, and custodial care in a building occupied as a residence by a Foreign Service officer to the amount allowed Foreign Service officers when occupying non-Government-owned quarters. There is also a reduction in this appropriation.

On the same page there is a reduction in the pay of the three commissioners of the International Boundary Commission. This commission was established many years ago, and you will find full hearings in reference to this item. The salary of the commissioners up to two years ago had always been $7,500. The House refused to increase it to $10,000 and it was increased in conference. The House committee felt that the amount should be placed at what it had always been since the creation of the commission, and I invite your careful attention to the hearings on this subject.

Mr. ARNOLD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. ARNOLD. Did the gentleman's committee go into the question of whether or not continuation of this commission is essential?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. This commission is created under a treaty, and we did not go into that. There are some pending questions of importance now before the commission and it was intended to be a continuing commission under the treaty, and, of course, we had no authority to change it.

Mr. ARNOLD. Is there work for them to do requiring the expenditure that is being made for this purpose?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I may say this. There are some questions pending before them of importance. I have felt that so long as the commission continues there is always this danger. Parties who are interested in building power dams will make it a point to bring pressure on the two governments to refer such questions to the commission when, in fact, there is no real public need for the matters to be so referred.

Personally, I think when they shall have completed the inquiries that are now before them there is no pressing reason why the commission should be continued.

Mr. ARNOLD. It just occurred to me that this is a service that could have been dispensed with earlier, if we had gone about it properly.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. That is a matter, of course, for the Congress to determine, and it is not a matter our committee can control in the slightest.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Would not that have to be done by treaty?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. We would have to withdraw from the treaty, of course.

There were two estimates submitted to cover the expenses of the commission to two international conferences—one known as International Radio-Telegraphic Convention and the other the Pan American Union—one to be held in Madrid and one in Montevideo, and for each of these commissions the Budget had estimated $120,000. The committee cut the one to Madrid to $90,000 and the one to Montevideo to $80,000. One will be in session six weeks and the other about three months or two and a half months.

I think this covers the items that perhaps the House would be most interested in under the State Department, and, as I say, if there are other items about which you desire information, as we read the bill, the committee will be pleased to endeavor to give you the information.

Next, coming to the Department of Justice, I want to invite the attention of the committee to a very interesting statement made by the Attorney General, appearing on page 313 of the hearings. I think you will be somewhat interested to know that when the question was raised in the subcommittee as to whether the congestion in our courts is primarily due to the increased criminal business growing out of the prohibition act, the Attorney General, in response to inquiries on that subject, made a study of the subject and submitted a very interesting table in which he shows very conclusively that the civil business in our courts has grown more rapidly than has the criminal business, and I invite your attention to the very interesting statement he makes on pages 313 et seq. of the hearings.

You will also be interested in a statement made by Mr. Woodcock, who has administered the Prohibition Bureau. Permit me to say this, that no matter what may have been the individual opinion of members of the committee as to the wisdom of the prohibition amendment—and, of course, we had two members, I believe, who are not, as you know, in very great sympathy with it, all of the committee were, I think, impressed with the fact that Mr. Woodcock had administered the funds placed in his hands in a thoroughly efficient way, and I invite you to carefully read all of the hearings on that subject.

I do not think I ever heard a witness testify in reference to a controversial matter who seemed to be so free from any feeling, and who more evidently had endeavored to the utmost of his ability to secure high-quality men in his organization, and to avoid, as far as possible, some of the things that have been done in the past and have subjected law-enforcement officers to just criticism.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. Has there been a marked improvement in the service?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I think there has been since the transfer from the Treasury Department.

Mr. ARENTZ. Statements have been made that since the transfer from the Treasury Department the cost of the bureau has been increased.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I will state that Congress authorized, as you know, more men for the field, and the appropriations were increased for that purpose. The last session of Congress increased the appropriation to enable the bureau to employ more field men, and the appropriation this year is just the same as in 1932; that is, for the present fiscal year.

It may be interesting to state that the amount of fines collected and paid into the Federal Treasury by this bureau during 1931 was approximately $4,000,000 plus, and the amount of the fines assessed in cases prosecuted in State courts which the bureau instituted amounted to more than a million dollars. Mr. Woodcock was unable to state what part of the State fines had been collected, since they were payable to the State.

The amount of property seized by the bureau in 1931 amounted to about $24,000,000. The value of the property so seized, estimated by appraisers, added to the fine collected and paid into the Federal Treasury, would have exceeded the amount of the total appropriations of $11,000,000 carried for this particular service.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Did the Government realize cash on this seized property?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. This property consisted in part of copper, alcohol, automobiles, and so forth, some of which was turned over to Government departments for use. The automobiles seized were sold in most instances, but brought little money.

Mr. ARENTZ. I am much interested in the gentleman's remarks. Do I understand the gentleman to say that there is no net cost of prohibition; that the fines and property seized amount to the appropriation?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Woodcock was not talking about the net amount. He did not take into account the court costs and expenses in the trial of cases. He was only measuring the amount that was appropriated for his bureau, with the value of the property that was seized and turned over to the Government, and the fines collected.

Mr. MORTON D. HULL. That is the cost of the bureau?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The amount we appropriated for the bureau.

Mr. CHRISTGAU. Has the gentleman got the figures of the cost of enforcement, including the court costs?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. You will find that discussed in the hearings, in answer to questions by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM]. There is hardly any question in reference to prohibition enforcement that was not raised and discussed at very great length in the hearings. And you will find that Mr. Woodcock had prompt and very satisfactory answers for the numerous questions propounded by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. TINKHAM] and the gentleman from New York [Mr. GRIFFIN].

Mr. CLANCY. Did Colonel Woodcock give any information as to what it is costing the city, county, and State welfare commissions to support the families of prohibition offenders who have been sent to prison?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I do not think that was discussed. I suggest the gentleman refer to the hearings.

Mr. CLANCY. It is very important, when we are talking about the cost. A very large part of the cost which falls on the people is the maintenance of the families of these offenders. He might have told you that in the Department of Justice they now have an agency for contact in respect to welfare conditions. I was near Asheville, N. C., at one time when they sent down a whole trainload of prohibition offenders to Atlanta. Hundreds of their relatives were then without support.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The gentleman has raised a controversial question. There are many who disagree wholly with the conclusions that he has reached from his study of the subject. Many feel that prohibition has brought about great savings to families, and that the money heretofore wastefully expended on liquor has been expended in providing food and raiment for the family.

I do not want to enter into what is just a controversial question. I was making simply a plain statement of what it seemed, from Colonel Woodcock's statement, the fines imposed in cases brought by that bureau and the appraised value of property seized amounted to in dollars and cents.

Mr. CLANCY. Is it not fair to add the cost to which I refer?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. That is a matter of argument. I recognize that the gentleman entertains that opinion. I entertain quite a different opinion, and our differences can not be settled here.

Mr. ARNOLD. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. ARNOLD. There seems to be some confusion in regard to the statement made a while ago by the gentleman from Alabama, and to get the matter cleared up let me ask him this question: Do I understand the gentleman to say that the fines, confiscations, and forfeitures amount to $11,000,000 more than the amount appropriated in this bill?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Oh, no. I said that the fines collected were something more than $4,000,000, and that the appraised value of the property seized, added to the fines, would equal and probably exceed the appropriation carried for this bureau, to wit, about $11,000,000.

Mr. HART. Is the property seized property that may be resold, or does it include stills which are destroyed?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Some of the stills are destroyed, and some of the copper is used by Government agencies where those agencies may need it. Alcohol is turned over to different agencies of the Federal Government. Some of the property seized has been sold, and much of it has been destroyed.

Mr. BLANTON. And summarizing the testimony of Colonel Woodcock, it showed, did it not, that, considering the fines and the property seized, the automobiles confiscated, and so forth, the bureau was just about self-supporting?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes; so far as the appropriation that we make for this bureau is concerned.

Mr. CLANCY. I do not believe the gentleman from Alabama wishes to give an unfair impression. Is it not true that the main cost of prohibition enforcement, the larger cost, larger than that of the Justice Department, is in the Treasury Department, in supporting the customs and customs border patrol and the Coast Guard?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. That is an item that we did not take into consideration.

Mr. CLANCY. Certainly the fines, confiscations, and property sold do not give us enough money to pay the cost of prohibition enforcement?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. My statement related only to the appropriations carried in this bill, and I had not intended to convey any different impression.

Mr. BLANTON. But the border patrol protects against aliens and narcotics and various other matters.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Those are all matters, of course, about which controversies may arise. I was simply making a statement as to this particular appropriation, and what those who are employed under this appropriation had been able to turn in to the Government in the way of fines, and so forth.

Mr. CLANCY. Is it not true that we do have a very extensive and expensive immigration border patrol and a narcotic bureau with many field agents?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Some of that appears in this bill, of course.

Mr. BOYLAN. Of course, the three departments that the gentleman enumerates are engaged in putting people in jail, are they not?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I was coming to that.

Mr. BOYLAN. I mean the three departments where the appropriations are not cut. They are engaged in putting citizens in jail.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes. There were more than three appropriations not cut, but there were three appropriations which related to law enforcement which this House has expressed great interest in, namely, the prohibition law, the antitrust law, and the immigration law, and in all of these the appropriations have been carefully administered with a view of laying aside something in the event an emergency arises, and although all of these appropriations may show this year an unexpended balance we carry the Budget estimate for these three services because the committee felt that the House was equally interested in the enforcement of all these laws. As you know, this matter will be discussed at greater length under the two hours set apart for that purpose on next Tuesday, and I am sure none of us now desire to take too much time on that subject.

The hearings are very full, and that is why I call attention to it. I do not think that any of the questions that might be asked that I could answer are not to be found in the hearings.

The next item of very great importance and from which we have made the large reductions in the Department of Justice relates to the prisons, and for that reason I have brought here a map which shows the situation. Gentlemen will remember that we had two reports—one from a congressional committee and one from the Wickersham Commission—suggesting the building of additional jails and prisons, and calling attention to the crowded conditions of the prisons we then had, and in May, 1930, as I recall, the Judiciary Committee of the House authorized the building of a number of new jails and prisons.

We had, at the time that authorization was made, just six prisons; one at Atlanta, with a housing capacity of perhaps around 2,000 but where we have been carrying fairly well over 3,000, even as high as 4,100. Then at Leavenworth we had the main prison, with a prison population of about 3,100, and the annex recently secured from the Army, within 2 miles of the main prison, where there are about 1,800 drug addicts. Then at Alderson there are about 480 women, and we had a camp that we had taken over, where we are constructing permanent buildings, known as Chillicothe, with a population of about 1,200 to 1,600, the ages ranging from 18 to 25—some older. Then we had McNeil Island prison, out on the west coast, with a population of 980. Those were the six prisons we had in 1930. We have not completed any large prison since that date.

One will come into completion about the latter part of August, 1932, known as the Northeastern Penitentiary, in Pennsylvania, with a population capacity of more than 1,200. We have built a number of camps, six in number. Formerly we had a camp in New York and one at Camp Meade, which have been abandoned. Now we maintain six camps and they now have a population of about 1,600, and it is expected that the population will be increased to about 2,000 in 1933. Then we have built some jails, likewise under the authorization of Congress. One is completed at New York; one is nearing completion at New Orleans, and one is nearing completion in El Paso. All three of these will be completed by the beginning of the fiscal year 1933, and they will have a prison capacity of about 800. That could be increased.

Then it is planned, with appropriations already made by the former Congress, to build a jail in Minnesota and one in Michigan, with a joint capacity of about a thousand, and a jail in Kentucky of about 600 capacity, adding thus an additional 1,600 prison capacity.

We have now about 13,000 prisoners in Federal prisons, jails, and camps. Then we have in jails scattered throughout the country, several States, counties, and cities, 11,000 prisoners, making in round figures about 24,000 in Federal and State prisons. Most of those in State, county, and city jails have short-term sentences.

Now, we have on parole about 4,700. Note that has increased in the last two years from 1,200 plus to 4,700 plus. Then there are on probation now about 17,000, and that number has increased in the last two years from 4,000 plus to 17,000 plus.

I mention this because it is pertinent to what I shall say with reference to the reductions that the committee is recommending relative to a further increase of our prisons.

Another bill carries a large sum for the Public Health Service to build a narcotic farm near Lexington, Ky., with a capacity of more than 1,200. It is the purpose of the Public Health Service, when that building is completed, as it will be in the fiscal year 1934, which as you know begins July 1, 1933, to transfer those drug addicts from the annex prison near Leavenworth, over to the Lexington home.

I have called your attention to these matters in order that you may understand what prison space we will have in 1933. In the new penitentiary in Pennsylvania, more than 1,200; in the new jails that are now nearing completion, more than 1,000; in the new jails that are being planned and will be completed in 1933, more than 1,500; and then in the narcotic or drug home that is being constructed by the Public Health Service, more than 1,200. So we are providing quite liberally for the future.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. SABATH. The gentleman's wonderful report shows a great achievement on the part of this administration, does it not, providing and building and increasing jails to such an extent; but does the gentleman not think we should do something to try to diminish the tremendous increase in those jails? Would it not be much better to do that than to enlarge this appropriation for jails?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. That is just exactly what we intend asking you to approve. I was just coming to it.

Mr. SABATH. I would be delighted to vote for something like that.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I felt that a gentleman like the gentleman from Illinois, as well as others, might want information first, on which he could intelligently act, and I was seeking to give the gentleman a basis on which I think he will be justified in substantially reducing many of the appropriations recommended by the Budget for increasing jail and prison facilities.

Mr. SABATH. I will be delighted to secure additional information, but I just wanted to make that observation to give the administration credit for the great achievement in increasing jail facilities as they have in the last few years.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Permit me to say that this is under direct command of Congress, and the Congress appropriated the money for that purpose. Congress is alone responsible for the increase in jails and prisons, and at the time that this large prison expansion was provided for, namely, in 1930, as I stated, the prison population was leaping upwards and I am gratified to state to you that now it is going down.

It began to go down the latter part of 1930. It went down a little more in 1931, and the present reports in 1932 show the trend to be still downward. That was an added reason why we should give attention to what amount this bill should carry for the further expansion of our prisons.

Mr. MAY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. MAY. As a matter of information, I would like to know if the gentleman has obtained sufficient information to be able to tell us whether there has been an increase in the number of addicts to narcotics since the national prohibition law, over and above what it was before; and if so, what the increase is?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I do not recall whether there is anything in the hearings on that subject, and independent of the hearings I would not know whether there has been shown any increase in the number of drug addicts since that time. However, the increased population of drug addicts, I think, has grown in the last 10 years.

Mr. MAY. In about what proportion?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I do not recall. The gentleman will find a table giving that information in the hearings. I do not recall offhand.

Mr. CLANCY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. CLANCY. Were there any statistics given as to the decrease in the jail population in Canada since they abolished prohibition?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. No. We did not go into a discussion of matters outside of continental United States.

Mr. CLANCY. As a matter of fact, I understand their jail population has decreased and that they have abolished a prison or two.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. That is a matter to which I assume the gentleman will call attention on Tuesday.

Mr. FINLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. FINLEY. If the law against stealing were repealed, that would help to decrease the population of jails, would it not?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes. I again want to call your attention to that most interesting information which the Attorney General supplied in response to our request. He made a search for the information in response to questions asked of him, and his report was very surprising to me. You will find it on page 213, showing how rapidly since 1910 the civil business in our courts has increased. It shows that civil litigation has increased far more than our criminal business. I am trying to give you facts so that you may read statements referred to and draw your own conclusions.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. Is it not a fact that the civil business in our courts has increased, especially in the last three years, because of the tremendous number of receiverships and bankruptcies?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Unquestionably so, and that appears from the Attorney General's statement.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. I desire to ask the gentleman with reference to the appropriation for the United States hospital for defective delinquents at Springfield, Mo. Will the gentleman get to that later?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I will get to that in a few minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. I will reserve my question until then.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. May I inquire whether or not the gentleman has reached the item relating to the industrial reformatory at Chillicothe, Ohio?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I will come to that in a few minutes also. I do want to say this, as a further predicate on which the committee based its recommendations for reductions; I wish to refer to the probation system. The judges are now very much interested in giving a suspended sentence to first offenders, and you will find that this was a factor we took into account in recommending reductions in appropriations for prison expansion.

Now, then, in reference to probation, may I say this: It is interesting to note from the hearings that in 1926 and 1927 the appropriations then carried were not expended. We carried $50,000 in 1926 and 1927 for the purpose of employing probation officers. The judges were not very much interested at that time and there were only three probation officers appointed. So the next year we reduced it to $30,000, and we still found that not half of the appropriation was expended. Then we reduced it to $25,000 and we found that was more than sufficient to care for it, and not until 1931, when you made a change in the fundamental law authorizing the appointment of probation officers, did we find real interest shown by the judges. Then we carried an appropriation of $200,000. And mark this: The probationers then increased in two years from 4,000 to over 17,000.

Mr. KELLER. With the approbation of the judges?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes. It is interesting to note, in that connection, that we now have only about 63 probation officers. They cover 55 judicial districts out of the 85, and we only carried $230,000 for their pay in the present fiscal year and for the pay of 12 clerks. In view of the statement made by the judges, concurred in by the Attorney General, the question was submitted to the Bureau of the Budget as to the wisdom of increasing that appropriation and giving to the judges an opportunity in a larger way to exercise their discretion in the carrying out of the law which Congress passed some few years ago. Following that the Bureau of the Budget submitted to us an estimate of $440,000; in other words, an increase of $210,000 over the present year. The committee has approved that estimate, and you will note that, according to its report, more than 40 additional probation officers can be employed and about 30 additional clerks.

We have limited the mileage and subsistence allowances, because that is where it might be abused, to $80,000, instead of $120,000 as suggested by the Budget. I think you will find that this will meet with the very hearty approval of the judges. If with 63 probation officers and an appropriation of $230,000 we have rapidly increased probationers from 4,000 to 17,000 plus, and the judges favor this increase of additional probational officers, I think you will find we can take the prison load off our jails and prisons in this way.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. SABATH. As one who 35 years ago started and advocated the probation system, I may say that I did that at the time, because many arrests were made unnecessarily, and as a police magistrate, I did not like to send people, especially young people, to jail for ridiculously small offenses. I would not ask this question of every gentleman, but I know how broad minded and liberal minded the gentleman is, and does he not think it would be much better if we would eliminate many of these unnecessary arrests so that it would not be necessary to have 17,000 people, most of them young people, out on probation?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. After the gentleman has read the hearings, and I am sure he will read them, suppose the gentleman and I discuss that on Tuesday, and I shall then be glad to give the gentleman such information as I have.

Mr. SABATH. I thank the gentleman for that courtesy.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Will my colleague yield for a question?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I do not know whether any evidence was offered; but if it were, it would probably be in the nature of an opinion as to whether or not liberalization of the parole law has justified itself as a corrective criminal procedure. In other words, from the gentleman's observation, does he think that liberalization of strict enforcement of sentences by the method of parole has had a good, corrective influence?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I am very pleased the gentleman has asked the question, because the judges are of the opinion it has, and the report of the probation officers is to the same effect, and what is even stronger still, the large number of volunteer probation officers and civic organizations, like Rotary and Kiwanis and others, that sometimes are interested in the future of an offender, all seem to unite in the opinion that the probation law is working splendidly in the rehabilitation of offenders.

Mr. BANKHEAD. We are all certainly pleased to have an expression of that opinion, because many of us have always been heartily in favor of the system.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. It was because of this very strong indorsement by the judges and the organizations to which I have referred that the committee felt justified in recommending this appropriation to the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama has consumed one hour.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I yield myself 30 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman is recognized for 30 minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. BOYLAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. BOYLAN. The gentleman will recall that a special committee appointed by the Seventieth Congress of which I happened to be a member recommended an increase in the number of parole and probation officers, and also a change in the parole system, taking it out of the prison itself and making it an independent commission, on the theory that it was better to parole them than to have them in jail.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. It is a very interesting report, I may say, that the gentleman's committee submitted, and evidences the fine humanity that always has characterized the gentleman in his dealing with matters of this kind.

Mr. SABATH. Will the gentleman from Alabama yield to me once more?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. SABATH. During the consideration of the Clayton Parole Act, which was a good many years ago, I was fearful, in a measure, and so stated on the floor, that, although I believed in the system, those with great influence and power behind them could easily be benefited by parole under the system and the unfortunate fellow without any influence would not receive a great deal of consideration. In this connection may I ask if the gentleman upon investigation found whether those fears that were then expressed by me were justified or whether I was erroneous in my deductions made at that time?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. We have no information to that effect; and I will state that I left out of the hearings, because the hearings were rather extended, a number of letters from judges which I now think, before Tuesday, I will endeavor to collect and insert in the RECORD. I should like for the gentleman to read just what the judges now say in reference to the parole system.

Mr. SABATH. I shall be delighted to read that.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I think these letters will be informing to the House, because the judges are in better position to give information in reference to this matter than I am.

Now, coming down to the deductions that we have made, we will take, for instance, Chillicothe.

We have provided there a fund sufficient to complete the prison units, so that the boys who are there now occupying the buildings that our soldier boys occupied during the war, and which have been very comfortable, may move over into more comfortable, more permanent quarters, and this bill carries a sufficient appropriation to provide completed units and the essential utilities for such buildings.

We have deducted only $200,000 from the amount recommended by the Bureau of the Budget, because in looking over the building program we felt that this could very well be deferred and let the boys do the work, since one of the things that the law itself required of the Attorney General in connection with many of these prisons, Chillicothe being one, was that he should use prison labor to the fullest extent in the building of the prisons.

So we have made there a deduction of $200,000.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I understand that the organic law provides for the use of prison labor to this extent, that the Attorney General may use the same whenever practicable.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I will make this statement. The gentleman is correct in stating what the law requires. I think the Attorney General has been most liberal. The pressure has been very great, as appears in the hearings. In the first place, the Members from Ohio wished to have prison labor dispensed with altogether. I took occasion to say that, in deference and out of respect to the Members from that State, whom I hold in high regard, that that question was discussed on the floor. They protested against the brick kiln being continued, but the House overruled them. They were not in favor of prison labor being used to the extent that the law directed. That was natural. But I think the Attorney General, exercising his discretion, may have stepped over the line, rather than under the line, in reference to the employment of prison labor. But we will take that up when we reach the item in the bill.

Mr. SABATH. This prison in Chillicothe is only for juveniles?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. It is supposed to be, but they have a few who are over 30 years of age.

Mr. KELLER. They are first-termers?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes; I think so. Now, I have here a picture of Chillicothe, showing the buildings that are completed, and here are the buildings that will be deferred. They can very well be deferred, but prison labor will be used in completing those buildings and beautifying the grounds.

Next, we come to the new hospital near Springfield, Mo. There, the citizens have donated a plat of ground valued, I believe, at $135,000.

The authorization for that hospital was $3,000,000. Later the appropriation limited it to $2,500,000. It is a hospital for the mentally defective, the insane, the tubercular, the blind, the imbecile.

The contract was let last month; perhaps they have not started even yet on the building, and the contract allows four hundred and some odd days to complete it.

It was contemplated by the Budget estimate to put a tubercular hospital near by, with a bed capacity of 250 or more, at an estimated cost of $250,000 or $300,000. That is one item we left off, and we can discuss it when we reach the same.

The contract price for the buildings here shown on the map is $1,710,000, and the architect's fees are about $100,000. We have allowed an additional amount, the total, including previous appropriation, being $2,025,000.

So we have deducted from the Budget estimate about $500,000.

Mr. SABATH. Has the committee investigated whether this is a proper place for a tubercular hospital?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. That is one matter I want to bring to the attention of the House, when we come to that item, and the inquiry shows the great interest that the gentleman has in considering matters of this kind. It is a matter that I wish to call attention to later.

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman sometime in his address give the total proposed cost of prisons, camps, and hospitals?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I shall be glad to insert that later. It depends upon whether this Congress approves our recommendation. I shall be glad later to insert it. There is another hospital over in Oklahoma. You see they are scattered around, and naturally it is but human that the people in the neighborhood are not very friendly to the idea of these reductions.

Mr. McCORMACK. All of this comes under Mr. Bates?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. McCORMACK. He is a very fine gentleman.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes; he is a very efficient official.

Mr. SHALLENBERGER. I might suggest to the gentleman that we are very glad in Nebraska that they did not place any of these prisons in our State.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Over in Oklahoma they are constructing what is supposed to be a duplicate of the Chillicothe prison, and it is intended largely to take care of that class of prison population from west of the Mississippi River. We have looked into that carefully and found that for $225,000 out of the $500,000 first appropriated for this prison the administration and detention buildings had been let. A balance of $273,000 is left, and we appropriated only a sufficient amount to provide for a prison population of 600 in addition to what can be cared for in the detention building.

If later Congress finds it wise to expand this prison, it can be done with prison population. We have reduced the Budget estimate from $1,850,000 to $725,000 and have reappropriated the unexpended balance of $273,000. This will give a very complete prison unit.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Will the gentleman advise whether or not the organic act for the construction of the institution in Oklahoma provided for the use of prison labor?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. It did not.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Can the gentleman tell us whether or not all of the work on the institution in Oklahoma has been contract work?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The work that has been done, amounting only to $225,000, I understand has been let by contract, but very likely the rest of this building program will be let by contract, since there are no prisoners there to do the work. We had the idea of building slowly, so that we could get a prison population there, and if later Congress found it necessary to expand, prison labor could be used.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Does the gentleman know of any other way we could use a part of the prison labor we now have at the industrial reformatory at Chillicothe and do more of the work there by contract, which would help the unemployment situation? This would give additional work for free labor.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I think that he has made a more than liberal allowance for Chillicothe. I would like to have him use more prison labor there. I think it would be well within the authorization of Congress to do so.

Mr. PARSONS. About what is the penal population of all our prisons?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. We have 13,000 in the Federal prisons; we have about 11,000 in the State, county, and city jails; about 17,000 out on probation; and about 4,000 out on parole, making a total of approximately between 44,000 and 45,000 under all of those heads.

Mrs. ROGERS. Did not the committee have under consideration a Federal prison for Massachusetts within the last day or two?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. No; not this committee.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. What are the majority of the prisoners charged with that are in these Federal prisons?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The gentleman will find a full statement of that in the hearings. I am going to let the gentleman read about that up to 12 o'clock to-night because I shall refer him to the page later. All the information is there.

I want now to show another picture. We have more than 3,700 jails in this country, and the Bureau of Prisons has been inspecting these jails as rapidly as they could with the forces they have for the purpose of ascertaining whether they are suited for Federal prisons. They take into account, of course, safety, cleanliness, and health conditions, and the spots shown on this map which I now exhibit represent the prisons actually inspected. They number around 1,200. We have a prison population in these jails of approximately 11,000. That population varies, as I said, and the prison population trend is downward at present.

The inspectors are continuing their inspections, and they will add to the approved jails numerous others during the present fiscal year and during the fiscal year of 1933. That is another factor that entered into our recommendation that this heavy expense of building permanent prisons be deferred, and we have recommended very sharp reductions on that account.

Mr. PARSONS. About what is the total price per day paid for those in jail?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. They range from 59 cents to $1.10, the average being around 75 cents. The building of these jails, as I stated in different sections of the country, has had this effect: That where the county, State, and city jails have at sometimes in the past been rather exacting when we were seeking entrance there for Federal prisoners, they now are willing to give us more readily the prices charged to States, cities, and counties.

The Federal jails have had a tendency to bring down prices. It is thought that in the year 1933 the price will average around 70 or 75 cents.

Mr. KETCHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. KETCHAM. How does that average with the average price of maintenance in our Federal prisons?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. That depends entirely upon the population. The smaller the population the greater is the cost in Federal jails, of course. As the population mounts, then, of course, the cost decreases. For instance, at Atlanta, where there are 3,600, the cost is around $1,700,000.

At Leavenworth with 3,000 and Leavenworth annex with 1,800 it is $1,800,000 plus. At the jail in New York with 180 prisoners, where there is also a school, the expense is relatively larger, because the population is smaller.

Mr. KETCHAM. Is the gentleman able to say whether or not it averages above or below 75 cents?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Where there is a population of around 600 I would say it may possibly be a little less, but where there is a smaller population, of course, it mounts up. There has to be guard attendance just the same, and the overhead is rather high.

Now, I have here an interesting map. It is illustrative of what I said in relation to the growth of the probation system. This part of the map represents what we had in 1926 and 1927, when we had an appropriation of $50,000. The next year they carried still a large unexpended balance, and this territory was added to it. Then the following year we carried still an appropriation that was unexpended, and this territory was added. Then when we changed the law, authorizing the judges to appoint men of their own selection who were acquainted with the character of men whom they were willing to admit to probation, and we carried an appropriation of $200,000, the green portion of the map represents how rapidly it spread, and this is when it went up from 4,000 to 17,000.

With the increase we have given there will be sufficient funds to provide a probation officer for all of the territory shown in white, which now represents districts not served by paid prohibition officers.

This is a social service, and we have not wanted in the slightest to discourage that very fine volunteer service that always has responded to the call of humanity, and oftentimes there is a strong human appeal to local organizations and to local individuals to come to the help of the unfortunate. The number of volunteer probation officers, serving without pay, of highest character, runs into the hundreds. We have felt we must not make this a real career job, as it were.

We thought we should provide fair compensation but nothing more, so there is carried a limitation fixing the highest salary that can be paid to a probation officer at $2,600 and have suggested in our report that, taking into consideration the character of the probation officer, the number of probationers he will have to overlook, the extent of his territory, the character of the crimes, and so forth, the department should consider an initial pay of $1,800, $2,000, $2,200, and $2,400, leaving this to the discretion of the Attorney General.

Mr. HOCH. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. HOCH. Do the States shown in white indicate that the parole system has not been instituted?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The white portion shows where the parole system has not been instituted. There are some volunteers there, but there is no paid probation officer there, and there are comparatively few out on probation. The yellow portion represents the small increase for those lean years. These several colors represent step by step in years, and then the green represents when the law was changed and when the judges got behind it. Then the number rapidly increased from 4,000 to 17,000.

Mr. RAMSPECK. Will the gentleman say what the blue represents?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. That only represents the increase from year to year. The different years are shown.

We went into the question purely for the purpose of calling to the attention of the Committee on the Judiciary, if it should have any occasion to make further judicial districts, that they should take into account the very large expense incident to holding courts at so many places, and we had a map prepared in order that we might make a study of it so that we might be able to conclude therefrom whether there was heavy expense incident to the great number of places at which courts are now held. Later I may advert to that. The committee had a supplemental hearing printed which will prove interesting. It was printed after the full hearings, and I invite the Members to get it.

Passing to the Department of Commerce, I have only discussed the outstanding matters under each head. I want to call your attention to some interesting maps from the Aeronautics Bureau in the Department of Commerce, and we will take up the other interesting items in the Department of Commerce under the 5-minute rule.

I have three maps here. All of these will be in the committee room for your information if you desire them. This shows that we now have 19,000 lighted airways, or will have at the end of the present fiscal year, in continental America. The radiobeacons are shown on this map, which gives additional information relative to the lighted airways. I will not have time to go into the situation in detail.

This also shows where all of the radiobeacons are and where the airports are. These three maps give fine information, and indexes are carried on each.

This map gives another picture of it with the intermediate fields and likewise the lighted airways. These maps will not appear in the RECORD, because it is impossible to place them there, but they will be in the committee room for the information of any Member.

Here are two maps in which you will be interested. This is Central America, and the black lines represent the American companies. You will see how we have taken over the air mileage in Central America.

The maps over here show all of the companies that are operating there, and you will find that the American Airways have 7,465 miles and another American company 2,295 miles. You see the strategic positions the American companies occupy. You find three routes leading from Cuba. Here is one coming over in this direction; here is another entrance, and here is another.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. MANSFIELD. Why do we extend our air mail service over foreign countries when they do not extend their service over our country?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. It was thought wise to do so. You might read the hearings on the Post Office bill and the other hearings which will be available later. I am simply bringing this to you for your information. This map shows South America, and you will see how American lines have circled it. These lines represent American companies.

I will not have time to go further into it, but each map is self-explanatory and will be found in the committee room.

Mr. KETCHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. KETCHAM. Is this done by negotiations between our Government and foreign governments?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I think so. You would be surprised at the saving of time in communications between continental America and these countries. That all appears in the record. I can not go into those details, but we developed that very fully because we felt the House would be interested in such information.

Coming to the Department of Labor, I have only just a few minutes. I would like you to read the statement contained in the report made by the committee in reference to employment offices. We have approached this not in any controversial way but only for the purpose of laying it before the House as practical business men. [Applause.]

[Here the gavel fell.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the bill for amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Salaries: For Secretary of State, $15,000; Under Secretary of State, $10,000; and other personal services in the District of Columbia, including temporary employees, and not to exceed $6,500 for employees engaged on piecework at rates to be fixed by the Secretary of State, $1,915,540; in all, $1,940,540: Provided, That in expending appropriations or portions of appropriations, contained in this act, for the payment for personal services in the District of Columbia in accordance with the classification act of 1923, as amended, with the exception of the four Assistant Secretaries of State and the legal adviser of the Department of State, the assistant to the Attorney General and six Assistant Attorneys General, the Assistant Secretaries of Commerce, the Assistant Secretary and the Second Assistant Secretary of Labor, the average of the salaries of the total number of persons under any grade in any bureau, office, or other appropriation unit shall not at any time exceed the average of the compensation rates specified for the grade by such act, as amended: Provided, That this restriction shall not apply (1) to grades 1, 2, 3, and 4 of the clerical-mechanical service, or (2) to require the reduction in salary of any person whose compensation was fixed as of July 1, 1924, in accordance with the rules of section 6 of such act, (3) to require the reduction in salary of any person who is transferred from one position to another position in the same or different grade in the same or a different bureau, office, or other appropriation unit, or (4) to prevent the payment of a salary under any grade at a rate higher than the maximum rate of the grade when such higher rate is permitted by the classification act of 1923, as amended, and is specifically authorized by other law, or (5) to reduce the compensation of any person in a grade in which only one position is allocated.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, I trust that I am in no wise violating the proprieties or decorum that should obtain in the discussion of matters in the Committee of the Whole when I undertake in a few words to pay what I think is a most deserved compliment to the ability and industry of my distinguished colleague from Alabama, the chairman of this subcommittee [Mr. OLIVER]. [Applause.]

I do not undertake it in any sense of fulsome praise or flattery. I have often taken occasion to observe that probably the most laborious but nevertheless the most important work, particularly in times like these—and I say this without any invidious comparisons—that may be done by a Member of Congress is done in the Committee on Appropriations. The very nature of that work, the industry that is required, the persistence in the pursuit of legitimate details of information which should accompany the reports of the committee to the House and to the Committee of the Whole, involve an enormous amount not only of public responsibility but also of personal drudgery and detailed labor.

I happen to know that in this particular instance, because of my intimate touch and association with him, that my colleague for the last two months has not only been laboring with his associates—being charged with the personal responsibility of preparing this bill—but has worked many times until midnight in his home upon the details of this bill. I say, gentlemen, that not only the gentleman about whom I speak here to-day but all members of the Committee on Appropriations—and they are all thoroughly conscientious and devoted citizens of the Republic as well as faithful Representatives—deserve more praise, more honor, and more credit at the hands of their associates in this House than they receive.

I want to say that my friend from Alabama occupies a rather unique distinction in the political annals of my State. For 16 years he has been elected to the House of Representatives without opposition, either upon the part of his own party or on the part of the party in opposition. The last contest he had in politics was when, in my pride of opinion, I assumed to come to Congress from the same district in which we both then resided, and in the good judgment of the people of that district at that time it was decided that my colleague should come here to represent them instead of myself and that I should stay at home. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. May I say it was purely a deference to age at that time, and evidently there were some of our many mutual friends who felt that you might defer coming for one year until the creation of the new district could be provided, which you have so ably represented since.

Mr. BANKHEAD. By the fortuities of politics, Alabama having gained an additional Representative and a new district having been created, I had the honor of being sent here to represent them; otherwise I fear I should always have remained a private citizen.

Mr. MANSFIELD. I want to compliment the legislature of Alabama for so wisely redistricting the State. [Applause.]

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, these remarks, of course, have taken a wider range than I anticipated when I rose. I trust I have the indulgence of the committee in having presented them, because I felt in this instance, as in many others upon the part of the Representatives upon the Committee on Appropriations, a just meed of praise and appreciation should be shown to our faithful servants upon that committee. [Applause.]

Mr. KETCHAM. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Yes; I will be pleased to yield.

Mr. KETCHAM. Agreeing with what the gentleman has said concerning the fine spirit shown by the Appropriations Committee in bringing in these bills, does the gentleman not agree that there is likewise a fine opportunity for the Members of the House generally in these particular times to make a most careful study of all these various items, to the end that the economies that have been worked out may possibly be added to by the Members of the House?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Exactly; and my only regret is that my distinguished colleague did not make his explanation of the bill at the beginning of the discussion, when he would have had a fuller attendance on the part of the committee.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, of course, I appreciate the kind words of my good friend from Alabama, and in reference to the inquiry of the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KETCHAM], I would like to say this: The committee has no pride of opinion in its recommendations. We have made no arbitrary reductions, but feel good reasons can be offered for the reductions made, and we hope that the House will study the bill with a view of effecting, if possible, further savings. [Applause.]

Mr. SHREVE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to join with my good friend the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BANKHEAD] in saying a few kind words about the distinguished gentleman who now has charge of this bill. Of course, you know I refer to my good friend the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER]. We have been working together for the last 10 or 11 years, and I want to assure the House that the same unanimity prevails in that committee that has always prevailed there. The committee handling the appropriations for the Departments of State, Justice, Commerce, and Labor is doing its work with exactly the same spirit it has exemplified during all the years that have gone by, and I want to say to you that this time, perhaps, we have had the most exhaustive analysis of the bill that has ever been made.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] is entitled to a great deal of respect and a great deal of credit for the painstaking efforts he has made in order to dig down and get to the foundation of numerous appropriations.

Gentlemen, while I am on the subject, you will notice there have been increases during the past year in various lines in all of our bills. Sometimes Congress is charged with increasing appropriations, and I am going to call your attention to just one item to show you that it is not the Congress so much as it is the people back home.

Take, for instance, the one item for the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce, which started 10 or 11 years ago with a very small beginning. I think we sent out commercial attachés and trade commissioners to about 24 countries of the world. The response was immediate. There was only one of these commercial attachés or trade commissioners who fell down, and this was the man we sent to Athens, Greece. There was a reason for this. It was because Greece at that time was overrun by the Armenians, her finances were low, and she had no money to buy goods.

so nothing was done; but, gentlemen, the very next year we received one contract from Greece that alone amounted to $25,000,000.

These offices then began to spread all over the world, because they were demanded in other countries. Our people doing business with these other countries demanded that we should have a commercial attaché or trade commissioner in these foreign countries to look after their business. So we began to expand gradually, with a few additional offices each year, until now we are in more than 50 countries of the world, and we are represented by one of the finest organizations that it is possible to build up.

Some may ask why we are continuing appropriations during these times that some call times of depression. The reason is simply this, gentlemen. No business man would let his selling organization go down for a short period of time because he was not getting business. We expect to get all of this business back some day, and the cost of this work in each individual country is small. Therefore, we are maintaining this organization all over the world, and we expect that some day it will be functioning just the same as it did two or three years ago.

This is just a sample of the various things that have been done, and I could call your attention to many other things that have come up in the same way.

The people come in here and demand these things. On one day before our committee we have had as many as 100 prominent business men attending a single session of the committee, and I remember that after we had gone along a while with our commercial attachés then the next demand was that we should have some commodity experts. Now, what is a commodity expert? He is a man who looks after a particular line of business, and it was desired to send such specially qualified men into various sections of the world where their intelligence, education, and knowledge were required, and very soon we found that everybody wanted expert trade commissioners. So we had to declare on the floor of the House that there would be no more commodity experts appointed and that the general trade commissioner must handle all kinds of special business.

Then after a while the offices here began to develop and there was pressure on Congress for the establishment of district offices.

You gentlemen know all about it. We had to yield to that pressure, and we established these offices in order to comply with their requests. It is up now to this House to curtail and turn over some of the offices into the cooperative offices. There will be no harm done, because merchants in some large cities of the United States prefer to operate under the cooperative system in their own building, in their own rooms, rather than to go around the corner and find an agent of the Foreign and Domestic Commerce. [Applause.]

Mr. CLANCY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. May I add my sincere tribute to the ability, integrity, and long record of splendid public service of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER]. I was in the Department of Commerce in 1913, when Germany was spending more money in this country in New York City alone to get world trade than the United States was spending all over the world to get world trade. When our movement was started in this country to get world trade we found the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] was one of the best friends of that movement, and he aided materially in the splendid success we achieved, and which meant added prosperity.

The world trade in my own city before the depression took place aggregated $335,000,000 per year. That is the amount of foreign money that entered into the district for our manufactured products. I got the Federal Commerce Department agency for Detroit in 1924, and one of the men who aided me in getting the appropriation was my good friend the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. SHREVE] assisted in a material degree. I got the item of $15,000 first in the Senate and these two splendid gentlemen protected the appropriation when it came to the House.

We know now that a good part of our depression in the United States is caused by the loss of the world trade, and that practically the entire depression was caused by the World War, and the collapse of many countries of the world and the rebellions and revolutions in at least 25 important countries.

It was not so important to us when Spain collapsed, but it was important when Brazil, Argentina, and countries of that rank collapsed and staged revolutions, and especially when Germany collapsed.

Now, I have taken quite a part in the debates on appropriation bills on the automobile amendment. It is in this bill on pages 125 and 126. I want to say to the gentleman in charge of the bill, Mr. OLIVER, that I do think it was unfair in the consideration of the Interior Department bill to have the important debate on this unsatisfactory amendment between 5 and 6 o'clock in the evening. Members rush in impatiently to vote on the pending question and yell, "Vote!" "Vote!" "Vote!" and do not listen carefully to arguments, and some hardly know what the issue is. They want to get home in a hurry.

I had protested on two former occasions when it looked as if the vote on the auto amendment was going to take place about 5.30. I was asked not to talk on the measure, but I did talk, nevertheless; and when the vote came, it came about 5.30 o'clock. In the confusion the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] was trying to tell me that that one amendment that I was asking was already in the amendment to the bill.

I thought not, because the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] showed me a draft of the amendment, and the language protecting the field service was not in it at that time. It was added later, I learned.

The House tied the original auto amendment to the agricultural bill with only 34 votes, 9 per cent of the membership of the House. It was very loosely and incorrectly drawn, and would have done a tremendous amount of damage.

I protested against it vigorously and the Senate Appropriations Committee has stricken out the entire amendment from the agricultural appropriation bill.

That was what I wanted rather than have the badly worded bill, and the Senators of the committee should be most highly commended.

The House amendment would have deprived the Cabinet member of his automobile, and would deprive the President of the use of his automobile if the amendment were tied to the appropriation bill affecting the White House. It would wreck the field service, especially of the Bureau of Roads. I suggested that the House was passing the buck to the Senate, and asking them to write the language correctly. Of course, there was great objection to that, and somebody rose perfunctorily and said that this is a very intelligent body, and that there was careful consideration given that amendment, and perfunctorily got a great deal of applause for defending this dignified body. But the RECORD shows that I was absolutely correct, because when the amendment did go to the Senate and the Senators tried to juggle the language around, and they found that they could not, they threw out the whole amendment. Thus the Senate snapped the buck right back to the House. That automobile amendment is now cut off the agricultural appropriation bill.

My arguments were put before the House in some 8 or 10 short speeches under the 5-minute rule, because I had to get in under the 5-minute rule, not being able to get time otherwise.

I have three amendments that I think should be made to the clause in the pending bill on page 126. First let me say that a Cabinet officer will be allowed to use his automobile in the pending bill. But the gentleman from New York [Mr. SNELL] questioned last Tuesday as to the Assistant Secretary's car, and I said that he would be prevented from using his automobile under the language as it now stands, and so would the Acting Secretary. Why not clear up the language as to Assistant and Acting Secretaries.

Two more amendments should go on that bill. One would raise the $750 limitation and the other would strike out the word "exclusively."

Why do not the gentlemen on the Appropriations Committee submit to the House the facts and arguments and statistics which they said they have on this matter relative to the possibility of buying official cars in any State under $750? The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. MAPES] asked the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. DOUGLAS], who was defending the bill last Tuesday, where these statistics are and why the House is not given them, and the gentleman from Arizona did not answer satisfactorily. I showed conclusively, from the RECORD a few weeks before, that the Interior Department could not buy a closed Ford automobile, getting the big factory-reduction price at only $488, and deliver it at Shoshone, Ariz., for a cost of less than $753. The freight was too high and the cost ran $3 over the $750 limit. I asked the gentleman in charge of the bill to place before the House figures showing that they can buy a closed car at the lowest price, the cheapest car, in those remote regions for $750, and I ask the very fair gentleman, Mr. OLIVER, to do that on this bill. Of course, my argument here is the same argument as the argument of the departments and the bureaus—that they find they have to pay over $750 for the lowest-priced car in some regions when the freight is added. Moreover, they have found by much experience that in the heavy travel in the mountains a heavier, rugged, high-powered car is a better car—that is, a 3,000-pound car in about the $1,000 class—and that it is really more economical and will last longer and be cheaper in the long run than the lowest-priced car. They buy the lowest-priced car in cases where it is more economical to operate it.

The second amendment I suggest is to strike out the word "exclusively." Gentlemen have written into the bill that the cars must be used exclusively on official business. That prevents the renting of a private car or the Federal employee's personal car in time of emergency, or when the official car is broken down, or in other cases.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman be extended for one minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. If the gentleman will submit to us the amendments he suggests, we will be glad to give consideration to the same.

Mr. CLANCY. Thank you most sincerely. Each of us wants to write the best legislation possible. With regard to the word "exclusively," I believe it prevents the Government from renting a car. In one agency of the Geological Survey they have four personal cars, which in time of emergency or rush of work they can use. What do you make them do in this case? You make them buy four official cars and keep them there until the time they may need them, and they might use them once a month or once only in three months. If you strike out the word "exclusively" you give those honest officials, and they are honest, an opportunity to rent a car at cheap rates. In this way you promote economy and not wastefulness of public moneys.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Michigan has expired.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I rise in opposition to the pro forma amendment. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CLANCY] is always interested in the automobile industry. If the conditions would permit, I would not object, but just now I myself have been devoting time and energy not to secure cars for Government employees but to secure food for the millions of unemployed. I think it would be better if we would devote our energies to relieve existing conditions.

I do not wish to say anything against the automobile industry; but because of the action taken yesterday, I am obliged to impose upon the House with these remarks. At about 5.15 o'clock yesterday afternoon the House adopted a unanimous-consent agreement whereby it will allow only two hours of debate on the so-called prohibition question and the appropriations under this bill. Because of illness in my family I shall not be able to be here Tuesday. I was hopeful that at that time I would be in a position to demonstrate to the chairman of the committee that we could easily cut off in the interest of the Nation at least $10,000,000 of these appropriations that go to enforce the prohibition law which everyone in the United States knows is nothing but a farce and will not and can not be enforced, because the people are opposed to enforcing it.

On the other hand, if I had time, I could show that if we would adopt sane legislation, we could bring revenue into the United States Treasury closely approximating $500,000,000 annually with a bill permitting the manufacture of 2.75 per cent beer by weight and the sale of the same in bottles only and taxing each bottle 3 cents per pint. This tax the people are ready, willing, and anxious to pay in contrast to the various industries which are opposed to any increase in taxes or to any tax that it has been proposed to put upon them to bring about an elimination of the billion-dollar deficit under this Hoover administration. But I do not have time, and I presume the committee has acted prudently and wisely in shortening the debate on that important question. I realize that nothing can be done in this House, anyway, and time is wasted, and we will not amend the Volstead Act or the prohibition act until after the next election.

After that election the people will have spoken, and then I am sure that the great majority of Members who will be elected to the House as well as to the Senate, and the President, who will be elected, will recognize the need of at least modifying the Volstead Act, thereby bringing about conditions which will reestablish confidence in the Nation and result in times better than those we have enjoyed in the last few years under this Republican administration.

Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact that I can not be here on Tuesday I ask unanimous consent to revise and extend my remarks on this important subject.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, the Filipinos, like every other ethnological group, have an ardent desire to develop their racial culture and national institutions with a feeling of tranquillity, and free from foreign initiative, influence, or control. We are laboring under a basic and fatal delusion if we think we can suppress their national aspirations. Some would have us believe that permanent Hadean darkness will settle over the Philippines if we grant their petition for self-government. I can not share their gloomy forebodings.

The Filipino has in his soul the same hunger for freedom and the same passion for self-government that inspired our Revolutionary forefathers to cast aside the English yoke. Seemingly there were many convincing economic and political reasons why the thirteen American Colonies should remain under the shadow and protection of the British flag. It was argued that a republic would be economically impotent, unable to maintain a stable government, and because of its limited military strength it would be incapable of resisting foreign aggression, and would quickly and inevitably succumb to the military prowess of some mercenary and conquering European nation. But against these insidious appeals the Colonies stood adamant. Convinced of the rectitude of their purposes, confident of their power to maintain themselves as a self-governing state, and trusting in the bounty of an overruling Providence our constitutional fathers proceeded to build a republic that is the wonder of the world, and that has on sea and land demonstrated its prowess and divine right to live, flourish, and bless mankind.

In his aspirations for independence the vision of the Filipino is not clouded by delay and despair, nor are his hopes palsied by disappointment. He realizes that the race is not always to the swift nor the battle to the strong. He has put his hand to the plow and will not look back. In harmony with an ancient maxim he is plowing with such oxen as he hath. He has set out to achieve independence. This purpose he will not forego. From this path he will not deviate. Knowing his cause is just, and that it must in the end prevail, he will not be goaded into rash or unwise action. He will not prejudice his cause by a resort to force or by any short cuts to the end sought to be accomplished. His appeal is to the mind, heart, and conscience of the American people. He will plead his cause in the forum of reason and common sense, relying on the same inherent, God-given, inalienable rights of man which we successfully invoked in our struggle with Great Britain for the priceless boon of self-government. By peaceful agencies the Filipino will come into his own, and at no far-distant day.

The argument that the Filipino will realize greater prosperity from trade and commerce and enjoy more rapid economic progress under the American flag does not and should not appeal strongly to the Filipino who feels within him the stir and passion for racial and national independence. It is unthinkable that they would barter their national birthright for commercial gain, freedom from responsibility, or racial subserviency.

The Filipinos do not want amity and commerce at the sacrifice of freedom. The passion for independence is not confined to a few highly educated Filipinos. It has become a national aspiration. It has permeated all ranks and classes of the Filipino race like a visitation.

Of course, the new Filipino republic will encounter cross-currents and rip-tides in the early stages of its independent national life. It will have to elbow its way through the crowd of nations. Its toes may be trampled and its shins barked, but that experience came to our own Republic and every other self-governing nation. No nation comes to full stature without jostling, jolting, and bumping, and I am persuaded the Filipinos are prepared to take their part of the bumps that come with the responsibilities of independence and self-government.

According to Charles Dudley Warner, "There was never a nation great until it came to the knowledge that it had nowhere to go for help."

In the checkered destinies of this old world who will say Providence has not reserved for the Filipino an honorable, perhaps a glorious future?

Few regions have been more richly blessed by the Creator than the Philippines. Far removed are they from the sweep of the rude boreal blasts, and yet not under withering equatorial rays, a semitropical climate; a fertile soil that under the magic touch of industry readily responds with abundant harvests; coastal lands and mountain ranges; mighty forests; some mineral; countless harbors in which fleets may find refuge from Neptune's fury and ride at ease; fruits in abundance; other worthwhile natural resources and potential wealth; a safe distance from the continents, yet not outside the track of commerce.

In the orderly processes of creation, when God gathered together the waters under the heavens, the flower-bedecked, grace-crowned, sea-girt Philippines rose above the limpid, laughing waters and burst into bloom and beauty. Caressing waves reflected the splendor of scarlet clouds and amethyst skies, through which the King of Day, in his chariot of fire, pursued his majestic course and with his radiant beams gilding earth and firmament with heaven's alchemy.

Though richly endowed with all these present and potential resources, the Philippines can never reach their highest state of development as a dependency of the United States or of any other nation. There is something in being a citizen of an independent state that develops initiative, increases capacity, expands genius, amplifies patriotism, and in many other ways better qualifies and equips men for the duties and responsibilities of citizenship. If the American colonists had remained subjects of Great Britain, even under a grant of power almost equal to independence, they never would have made the marvelous progress and achieved the phenomenal results that came to them as citizens of our Republic.

I am a friend of the Filipino people, though they are strangers to me. I am bound to them by the divinely spun and delicately adjusted ties of humanity and universal brotherhood. I would give them a place in the sun and in the circle of self-governing commonwealths. I am willing to share with them the blessings of self-government. I want them to have in their sun-kissed, sea-girt isle the same kind and degree of freedom that we Americans enjoy and which is the heritage and inalienable birthright of all mankind.

The independence of the Philippines is inevitable—just as sure as the return of the seasons; just as certain as the ebb and flow of the restless and resistless tides. An enlightened public sentiment in America, with the slow-moving but firm and inexorable finger of destiny, is now writing the declaration of Philippine independence. That independence will not be won by shot and shell; not by bayonets on sanguinary battlefields; not by the spilling of patriots' blood or the ravages of war, but it will come as the unconditional gift of the American people and in fulfillment of our national covenants. By the short-sighted policy of procrastination we may delay, but we can no more defeat the aspirations of the native inhabitants of the Philippines for independence and for a place in the sun than we can stay the sweep of the Gulf Stream or deflect it from the path in which immutable natural laws decreed that it should flow.

Many persons who have powerful business and financial connections, in their heart of hearts favor our permanent retention of the Philippines, but realize that it would be impolitic to frankly avow their program at the present time. Our pledge was made so recently, and has been relied on so confidently by our insular wards, that an unequivocal repudiation of this promise by our Government would shock the moral conscience of the Nation. So those who favor the policy of keeping the Philippines camouflage their real purpose by advocating postponement of action. They concede that we should at some time grant self-government, but they argue that the time is not ripe, and that the Filipinos must stand by and wait our own good pleasure and our own inerrable judgment as to when they are capable of managing their own affairs. With these men the time never will be ripe and the day will never come when they will admit the capacity of the Filipinos for self-government. Their plea is "not now but later," which, with many, means "not now and never." By constantly postponing action they hope to lull the Filipinos into inactivity and breach our national obligations. In the language of Macbeth they—

> Palter with us in a double sense;
> That keep the word of promise to our ear,
> And break it to our hope.

Many who oppose early Philippine independence are following the laissez faire or "let-well-enough-alone" policy. They would have us delay a decision on Philippine independence for 10, 20, or 50 years. Of course at the end of either of these periods these parties, or those who belong to the same school of political thought, will favor further delay and want action postponed for another 10, 20, or 50 years. I repeat, the longer we delay settlement of the Philippine problem the more difficult its solution becomes and the more complications and dangers attend its settlement.

The feet of the Filipino are at the door of the temple of freedom. His hand is on the door latch, and he passionately desires to enter. Shall we liberty-loving, liberty-enjoying, liberty-blessed Americans deny him entrance to this temple and shrine where we pay our obligations to the goddess of liberty? Shall we declare that the blessings of self-determination and free government are not to be enjoyed by the Filipino, especially when he craves the exercise of these prerogatives in the far-off islands where he was placed by a benign Providence? By granting independence to the Filipino we will not in any degree reduce the quantum of liberty or the blessings of free government that we enjoy under our free institutions. We can enrich the Filipino without impoverishing ourselves. Why should we hesitate? There is but one safe, sane, and sensible way to solve the Philippine problem, and that is by withdrawing our flag and granting complete independence. [Applause.]

Mr. MANSFIELD. Mr. Chairman, I desire to be recognized in opposition to the pro forma amendment.

I take this occasion, Mr. Chairman, to call attention to a matter that I believe all Members ought to be warned of. My attention has been called to a number of letters received by Members of Congress from some of their constituents soliciting money for the promotion of a bill which it is stated is on file with the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and that I, as chairman of that committee, propose to hold hearings upon it at the next meeting of the committee. It provides for the improvement of waters around Long Island Sound principally, and for a bond issue. The letters are signed by a man by the name of Robert Wilson Jackson, who signs himself as secretary of the committee on Federal appropriations for improvement of rivers and harbors.

I wish to state that there is no such bill pending with that committee, nor has such a bill been introduced in Congress. In view of the fact that he describes the bill as carrying a bond issue, if such bill were introduced it would be referred to the Committee on Ways and Means and not to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. [Applause.]

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

EXPENSES OF FOREIGN SERVICE INSPECTORS

For the traveling expenses of Foreign Service officers detailed for inspection while traveling and inspecting under instructions from the Secretary of State, $15,000.

Mr. SABATH. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of trying to secure a little information.

I notice we are appropriating very large sums of money for Foreign Service, and I am wondering whether it would be possible for that Foreign Service to secure information for this House and for the country as to what extent foreign countries permit the vicious practice of short selling which is permitted in this country, a practice which is ruining and destroying our commerce—which has destroyed our commerce—and which brought about the closing of 2,300 banks last year.

There was a hearing on my bill before the Committee on the Judiciary prohibiting short selling, which I believe is a detrimental practice. I think it is a curse to the Nation. Naturally, the gentlemen who are living on the profits of short selling and who derive tremendous benefits from this infamous practice have sent here some so-called professors and experts to show that foreign countries allow this kind of gambling which, I have stated, is permitted on our New York and other stock exchanges. In view of the fact that it will take a few days or a few weeks before the bill will be favorably reported I believe it would be of interest and benefit to this House and to the Members if we could secure from these foreign representatives of ours a report as to what extent other nations tolerate this abuse.

I understand that President Hoover had Mr. Whitney, president of the New York Stock Exchange, as his guest in the White House a few days ago, whereupon Mr. Whitney issued a statement yesterday to the effect that the stock exchange is amending its rules to restrict short selling, the new rule going into effect April 1, 1932. What is the rule? The rule provides that after April 1 every broker must secure a permit from those who have bought stock on margin before he can loan the stock to those who are selling it short. This in no way will prohibit short selling, for very few of those who buy on margin will refuse to sign such permits, because they do not understand that by agreeing that the stock which they have bought can be loaned for short-selling purposes, they unwittingly sanction the use of their stock against their own interests. They do not realize that when they sign on the dotted line they are signing their death certificates, since this permits the brokers to loan the stock to the men who sold stock which they do not possess, thereby causing an immediate reduction in the prices of those very securities or stocks which these "lambs" authorized to be loaned.

I wish to say to Mr. Whitney that this will no longer fool the people. They are beginning to understand the destruction that short selling has caused. Neither will it stop the hearings that are now being held on short selling nor favorable action on the part of the committee, for I am confident that when I finish giving my evidence and complete my arguments, and regardless of Mr. Whitney's radio speeches, I shall have convinced the country with the need for this legislation.

In to-day's press President Hoover makes the following statement in regard to short selling:

I have a question from the press as to conferences held with officials of the New York Stock Exchange. There have been discussions, as is reported, between myself and other officials of the administration with officials of the New York Stock Exchange on the question of bear raids.

Stock-exchange officials have, during the past eight months, from time to time taken steps to restrain bear raiding with a degree of success, but during the latter part of January, despite these steps, there was a large increase in the short accounts, which unquestionably affected the prices of securities and brought discouragement to the country as a whole.

I and other administration officials again expressed our views to the managers of the exchange that they should take adequate measures to protect investors from artificial depression of the prices of securities for speculative profit. Individuals who use the facilities of the exchange for such purposes are not contributing to the recovery of the United States.

If the conditions brought about by short selling were not so serious, and if the country were not suffering therefrom to the extent that it now does, this statement of the President would be very amusing to me, for he has pleaded with the president of the New York Stock Exchange, Mr. Whitney, to stop these destructive—yes, criminal—activities on the exchange.

After the stock exchange refused to listen to my urgent pleas to stop short selling and save the country from destruction, I appealed to President Hoover to put a stop to this nefarious practice. I called his attention to the fact that if the board of governors of the New York Stock Exchange did not voluntarily restrict the practice, the Attorney General and the Postmaster General could force it to do so. For over two and a half years I have been asking the President to act, but instead of action I have received promises, which, however, were short-lived, on up to the time when the attorney for the stock exchange pointed out to him that the stock exchange and board of trade looked with disfavor upon his statement, made about a year ago, to the effect that the abuses of the stock exchange should be rectified. In that connection permit me to read and embody into the RECORD the following telegram and letter that I sent to President Hoover:

CHICAGO, ILL., November 12, 1929.

His Excellency HERBERT HOOVER,
Washington, D. C.

To-day's press dispatches state that the professionals are still selling short. I am satisfied that this outrageous destruction of the small investors has gone far enough, and that immediate steps are needed to save the Nation from disastrous conditions that are bound to follow. It is the consensus of opinion of well-informed men that you, Mr. President, should call upon the financiers of this Nation to stop profiteering and formulate and carry out a plan to save the Nation from dire calamity.

A. J. SABATH.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., October 16, 1930.

His Excellency HERBERT HOOVER,
President of the United States, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: A year ago, before the crash, I called your attention to the approaching alarming conditions, and advocated and pleaded for a cessation of the disastrous pool, short-selling practice.

Therefore I read with some satisfaction in to-day's press of a conference you held with the New York Stock Exchange officials regarding short selling and the investigation of stock-exchange transactions by the Department of Justice. The report indicates that they question the Government's power to stop this prosperity-destroying practice.

No one can successfully deny to-day that the stock crash, to which you alluded in your December message, was responsible for and aggravated the conditions that have brought about the wrecking of hundreds of banks and financial institutions, the closing of thousands upon thousands of businesses, the destruction of thousands of factories and plants, thereby forcing out of employment millions of our citizens and causing untold want and misery.

It is known to be a fact that the New York Stock Exchange can curb short selling by the issuance of an order that all loanings and borrowings of stocks cease. This will bring short selling to a minimum. If the stock exchanges have any interest in the welfare of the Nation and in the reestablishment of confidence, they will, if not for the country's sake, then for their own sake, issue immediately such an order without questioning the power of the Government to stop this nefarious practice.

This in a great measure will eliminate uncertainty and will have a tendency to reestablish confidence, which is so sadly needed, for the resumption of the legitimate business of the country. Please be assured that my activity against these destructive shorts is prompted only by a sincere desire to improve the deplorable conditions of the Nation.

Permit me to remain, respectfully,

A. J. SABATH.

And, in addition, this telegram to the governor of the New York Stock Exchange:

CHICAGO, ILL., November 12, 1929.

THE BOARD OF GOVERNORS,
The New York Stock Exchange,
New York City, N. Y.:

To-day's New York press dispatches state that short selling is increasing. In view of conditions I express the opinion of many well-informed men that the board having power to stop all short selling should do so immediately, since the existing dangerous conditions demand such a step and may be helpful and beneficial to the entire Nation. Failure of the board to act may bring about conditions the seriousness of which no one can foretell and for which the board will be held responsible.

A. J. SABATH.

But these are not the only telegrams and letters I have sent to President Hoover and the officials of the stock exchanges. There were many others—some, in fact, much stronger—which at this time I will not read or have printed in the RECORD. However, with all of them I have not succeeded in making Mr. Whitney realize that his exchange must change its tactics and practices and give the people who insist on gambling—and that is all it is—a chance for their "white alley."

To-day I am satisfied in a measure that the President has at last pleaded with Mr. Whitney on his knees to issue some new order that would appease the public clamor against short selling. And their present actions indicate clearly that I was justified in my fight against this practice, which I began in 1929. They can no longer deny that short selling is detrimental to the economic and social life of the Nation and should be eliminated. That has been demonstrated and proven several times, and now it is acknowledged by them.

But if I were President I would instruct the Attorney General and the Postmaster General to proceed immediately against these racketeers, stop this infamous practice, and give the country a chance to reestablish the confidence that is so badly needed, for I am certain that so long as the practice of "bear raiding" continues the people who still have money will not attempt to invest it.

In the near future I shall give the House some real facts and the names of some of the outstanding financiers or manipulators who accumulated millions upon millions of dollars through short-selling activities at the expense of the Nation.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. GLOVER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. The speech of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SABATH] has prompted me to say what I shall say at this time. I have the honor to be a member of the Committee on Agriculture. That committee has been conducting hearings for a number of days on the very question spoken of by the gentleman from Illinois. The committee has had before it the various heads of these exchanges, and I am very glad to say to the gentleman that in my opinion we are going to report some legislation very soon which he will most heartily indorse, according to the views he has expressed to-day.

It is my honest conviction, after having heard these hearings for a number of days, that short selling ought to be abolished.

The President of the United States called the attention of the public to these exchanges a short time ago as to what they were doing, and there was a department which should have acted under the law. That department, however, took no action, but the fact that the President of the United States called attention to what they were doing did bring about some good. The short sellers for a few days went over on the long side; but, as a matter of fact, they were on both sides. I hope we can report some legislation in a few days which will not only permit the department to act in cases of this kind but which will go further than the stopping of it after it has started. I hope we can put some provision in the law that will authorize the department, when they know a thing of that kind is coming on, to take such action as will prevent it and punish those who engage in that practice.

There is no question but what the short selling of cotton, of wheat, and other products in a gambling way is a great detriment to those who produce those things. It is nothing but gambling, and it should be stopped. I have as much respect for a man who shoots craps as I have for the man who will take the cotton that a man grows by the sweat of his brow and short sell it in a way that will cause great loss to that man. Such men have no right to fix the price of those commodities before they go to the market.

I hope we will soon have an agency set up which will be able to handle wheat, cotton, and our other principal commodities without interference on the part of these exchanges. These exchanges could serve a good purpose. I have nothing against them as such, but whatever they do they should do in a legitimate way, but when they create conditions such as they have created in the past I say they are manifestly wrong.

The other day the head of one of these exchanges appeared before our committee, and I asked him how it was possible to tell 10 months ahead what a bale of cotton was going to be worth, even when the seed had not been planted. He said, "It is this way: Somebody will say, I would like to buy 10,000 bales of cotton in a certain month, and another man will say, I will give so much for it, and that fixes the price." He said, "That is a contract which is enforceable." But you and I know very well that it is only enforceable if the two men want to enforce it, but the fact is they never intended to enforce it when they engaged in it. That is what they are doing on these exchanges now, and I for one believe it ought to be stopped and that there should not be allowed to be any short selling of these commodities. Let them do a legitimate business and not do this other business. [Applause.]

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

RENT, HEAT, FUEL, AND LIGHT, FOREIGN SERVICE

For rent, heat, fuel, and light for the Foreign Service and the United States Court for China for offices and grounds, including annual ground rent of the embassy at Tokyo, Japan, for the year ending March 15, 1933, and, as authorized by the act approved June 26, 1930 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 5, sec. 118a), for living quarters and for allowances for living quarters, including heat, fuel, and light, $2,017,709: Provided, That payment for rent may be made in advance: Provided further, That the Secretary of State may enter into leases for such offices, grounds, and living quarters for periods not exceeding 10 years: Provided further, That no part of this appropriation shall be used for allowances for living quarters, including heat, fuel, and light in an amount exceeding $3,000 for an ambassador or a minister, and not exceeding $1,700 for any other Foreign Service officer: Provided further, That under this appropriation and the appropriation for "Contingent expenses, foreign missions," or the appropriation for "Contingent expenses, United States consulates," not more than $3,000 shall be expended for custodial service, heat, fuel, and light at any Government-owned building used exclusively for residence purposes for an ambassador or minister, and not more than $1,700 for such purposes in the case of any other Foreign Service officer.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Alabama offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. OLIVER of Alabama: On page 13, beginning in line 22, strike out the word "exclusively," and in line 23, after the word "residence," insert the following: "or residence and office."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For participation by the United States in the Seventh International Conference of American States to be held in the city of Montevideo, Uruguay, including personal services without reference to the classification act of 1923, as amended, and rent in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, stenographic reporting and translating services by contract if deemed necessary, without regard to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 41, sec. 5); traveling expenses and subsistence or per diem in lieu of subsistence (notwithstanding the provisions of the subsistence expense act of 1926 or regulations prescribed pursuant thereto, and by indirect routes if specifically authorized by the Secretary of State as necessary in connection with the work of the conference); hire of automobiles; purchase of necessary books and documents; stationery, official cards; newspapers and periodicals; printing and binding; entertainment; equipment; and such other expenses as may be authorized by the Secretary of State, including the reimbursement of other appropriations from which payments may have been made for any of the purposes herein specified, to be immediately available, $80,000.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of directing an inquiry to the chairman of the subcommittee. Will the chairman of the subcommittee be kind enough to give the committee an explanation as to the purpose of this international convention? I may say in that connection that it seems to me that in view of the quite general feeling in the country at this time that we should scan these international items with some degree of care, and I am sure the chairman of the subcommittee is thoroughly competent to inform us. I for one would like to have a word of explanation as to this particular activity.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I think the State Department is correct in stating that this is one of the most important conferences we hold, and it is hoped to send a very representative delegation to Montevideo, because through conferences of this kind we maintain cordial and friendly relations with all of the countries to the south of us. The department, naturally, is very much interested in this appropriation. The committee has carried what it felt was a sufficient amount for the expenses of the delegation.

Mr. KETCHAM. I notice that the amount requested by the Budget has been reduced by $40,000?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. KETCHAM. May I inquire how frequently these conferences are held?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. These conferences are held, I think, every three years. The last was the conference held in Cuba, as the gentleman may recall.

Mr. KETCHAM. I do.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. They hold them at certain stated intervals and, as I have said, the State Department considers this one of its important conferences.

Mr. KETCHAM. The whole purpose is to maintain the fine relationship which exists between our own country and the countries to the south of us?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. There are many important questions considered at these conferences.

Mr. KETCHAM. Do those discussions cover the whole range of our relationships, economic and otherwise?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I am so informed.

Mr. KETCHAM. There are no particular obligations, other than those of good will, that grow out of these conferences?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. None whatever, and the gentleman will find a very interesting statement submitted by Assistant Secretary Carr, under this item, in the hearings.

Mr. KETCHAM. I shall read it with much interest, but it seemed to me that in view of the importance of this item, and a number of others as to which I wish to direct inquiry, there should be a brief statement for the purpose of the RECORD, and I have made the inquiry for that reason and not for the purpose of questioning the appropriation.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I am pleased to have the gentleman call attention to the item.

The Clerk read as follows:

For the contribution of the United States toward the maintenance of the Bureau of the Interparliamentary Union for the promotion of international arbitration, $6,000; and in addition the unobligated balances of the appropriations "Bureau of Interparliamentary Union for Promotion of International Arbitration, 1932," and "Expenses, American Group of the Interparliamentary Union, 1932," are hereby reappropriated for this purpose.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. OLIVER of Alabama: On page 19, in line 5, strike out $6,000 and insert in lieu thereof $7,289.21.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, this is an appropriation in which the Members of Congress have been very much interested for some years, and members of the Committee on Foreign Affairs have recently discussed it with me.

I offer this amendment for the purpose of correcting a mistake made by the Assistant Secretary of State in stating to the committee that there was an unexpended balance of $4,000.

It was the purpose of the committee to appropriate a sufficient sum which when added to the unexpended balance would make the $10,000. The Assistant Secretary of State later informed me he was in error in stating that the unexpended balance was $4,000. The amendment increases the amount of $6,000 so that with the unexpended balance there will be $10,000 available, which is the sum recommended by the Budget.

Mr. KETCHAM. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. KETCHAM. With reference to this particular item, will the gentleman take two or three minutes to give for the RECORD an explanation of this item, so that those who may desire can have a place to which they may turn and find a statement as to the activities of the Bureau of the Interparliamentary Union.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The gentleman will find the activities set out on page 235 of the hearings.

Mr. KETCHAM. The trouble is that while the hearings are available for the Members——

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. And I will ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM], in the absence of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE], to make a statement as to the importance of these annual meetings. A number of our Members have attended meetings of the Interparliamentary Union, and I think the gentleman's question is very timely. The committee would like to have a report from some one who has attended some of the meetings, and I think the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CHINDBLOM] has.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Mr. Chairman, responding to the suggestion of the chairman of the Subcommittee on Appropriations [Mr. OLIVER], I will say it was not my privilege to attend the conference of the Interparliamentary Union last year. We had one meeting in Washington in 1925 in this Chamber. The Interparliamentary Union, in fact, grew very largely out of activities of the Congress of the United States. It was a forerunner, and I think it may fairly be said that the Union was the original creative power, of the Permanent Court of Arbitration at The Hague, created in 1907.

Former President Roosevelt, in his lifetime, took particular interest in the Interparliamentary Union. It is a voluntary body which, of course, can not impose, and does not attempt to impose, any obligations on the governments of the world, but provides a place and a time when representatives and delegates from all the parliaments of the earth may have an opportunity to meet for consultation and discussion. Its main purpose has always been the promotion of peace.

During the World War it naturally fell into desuetude and no meetings could be held, but since the World War the Union has attracted a great deal of attention, and I think it is now the one organization to which we in the American Congress may turn for some kind of cooperation with other nations in maintaining amicable and friendly relations, not of a political but more of a personal and a parliamentary character.

Mr. TILSON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Yes.

Mr. TILSON. Is there any sum here appropriated for the individual expenses of members attending the Union?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Apparently not in this item.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. No.

Mr. TILSON. Has it not been customary for at least a portion of the expenses of the members attending to be appropriated for?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. That has been done during the last few years, and I understand there is a bill now coming from the Committee on Foreign Affairs which will authorize such an appropriation. I presume if and when that bill passes it would be considered——

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama (interposing). There is no authorization at this time for the appropriation of any money for that purpose, and I will state that Governor MONTAGUE, who is president of the organization at this time, was suddenly called from the Chamber on account of illness in his family, or he would have been here to make a statement as to the importance of this appropriation.

Mr. TILSON. May I ask one further question as to how the Members who are to have their expenses paid, or partially paid, are selected?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. They are appointed by the president of the American group of the Interparliamentary Union. The president of that group now is former Governor MONTAGUE, of Virginia, a distinguished Member of this House. For many years the president of the American group was the Hon. Theodore Burton. Prior to that time the president of the American group was the late Senator William B. McKinley.

I may say that the Members of the House have received notice of a meeting of the American group of the union, to be held in the committee room of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of the House on the 24th instant, and it is hoped that Members of the House and of the Senate will avail themselves of the opportunity to attend the meeting.

A new set of by-laws will be presented at that time which will differ somewhat from those previously existing, and Members will be interested in ascertaining the purpose and past activities of the group at that time.

These by-laws make all Members of the House and Senate ipso facto members of the group. If any Member does not care to be considered a member, provision is made for withdrawal. There are no obligations in a pecuniary way.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Is there any report made on the proceedings of this group?

Mr. CHINDBLOM. My understanding is that the report has been filed here and inserted in the RECORD as to the meeting held last summer.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. I wish there was some way that some gentleman, a member of the group, could give us, in a speech on the floor, the purposes and what has been accomplished by this group. I hope it will be done, because a good many questions might be asked as to what has been accomplished and what is the relationship between our county and other countries. As one Member, I think it would be beneficial to have information along those lines.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I think it was the purpose of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] to deliver a speech of that kind.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. During the last year I have been a member of the executive committee, but I am not an officer. However, I am quite certain that in the early part of this session of Congress there was inserted in the RECORD a report of the meeting held during the previous year I can not at this moment state where that report may be found. It happens that I have been much interested and somewhat active in the work of the group, but our efficient president, Governor MONTAGUE, has handled its affairs, and I have not found it necessary to keep in close touch with the official activities of the group.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Members frequently are asking about this Interparliamentary Union, who are the delegates, how they are appointed, and they would be interested in an explanation of the accomplishments of the group, its purpose, and I think it would be interesting and beneficial.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I know that pamphlets have been sent to Members of the House and the Senate containing reports of the conferences of the union, but, like so many other reports that come to our desk, they frequently are overlooked.

Mr. KETCHAM. I am wondering in that connection if it would be in order to have the remarks made by the president of the International Parliamentary Union, Governor MONTAGUE, inserted in the RECORD at this particular point.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. I do not think that would be wise. It would be more appropriate and more beneficial to have it made a public document. I do not think it ought to be put in the RECORD, for that would defeat the very purpose we have in mind.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Let me say that it happens, unfortunately, that Governor MONTAGUE is absent from the Chamber because of the illness of a member of his family. I shall undertake to ascertain whether it is possible to obtain any material of the kind the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. KETCHAM] mentions and insert it at this point, if that can be done.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. I hope the gentleman will not ask it to be extended in the RECORD. Many of us have been asking for detailed information, and it ought to be given on the floor, where some of us can ask questions.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. I am practically a volunteer in this matter.

Mr. McCLINTIC of Oklahoma. Let us hold the matter up until we can see Governor MONTAGUE.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I am in thorough sympathy with the position taken by the gentleman from Oklahoma. I shall request the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. MONTAGUE] to arrange to make a statement to the House and give notice in advance.

Mr. KETCHAM. That would be entirely satisfactory to me, because some reference will doubtless be had in his remarks to the proceedings to-day, so that we may be able to locate them. The great difficulty I find is in being able to locate material quickly, which I desire to have when an inquiry arises as to a particular point under discussion. My purpose in rising at this time was to see if something could not be arranged while this item was under consideration.

Mr. CHINDBLOM. Then I shall consider myself relieved of the task of having remarks extended in the RECORD.

Mr. KETCHAM. As far as I am concerned, that is satisfactory. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Alabama.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

INTERNATIONAL INSTITUTE OF AGRICULTURE AT ROME, ITALY

For the payment of the quota of the United States, including the Territory of Hawaii, and the dependencies of the Philippine Islands, Porto Rico, and the Virgin Islands, for the support of the International Institute of Agriculture for the calendar year 1933, $5,400.

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In 1849 David Lubin was born in Poland of Polish parents. His father died in London when David was two years of age. He came with his remarried mother to the United States. He worked in a jewelry factory at Attleboro, Mass., and then drifted to Sacramento, Calif., where he first worked as a laborer, and having earned a little money, he became a merchant, dealing largely in overalls. He came in contact with farmers and learned their problems. He acquired a little farm and became interested in growing fruit and vegetables, in the meantime continuing his mercantile operations. He had a great mind and a great heart. He used the intellectual powers with which he was endowed in a manner helpful to his fellow men.

He was the originator and founder of the International Institute of Agriculture at Rome. He interested Victor Emanuel, King of Italy, in the project, and the King donated a building for headquarters of the institute and pledged $60,000 annually for the maintenance of the institute. The first meeting was held in 1905, 40 nations being represented.

Lubin was appointed a delegate to this first meeting by President Roosevelt. He died in Rome in 1919, after living to see 53 sovereign nations participating in the activities of this institute.

The institute collects and disseminates information relating to agriculture in practically every nation on earth. It consists of four bureaus:

1. Bureau of the secretary general.
2. Bureau of general statistics.
3. Bureau of agricultural intelligence and plant diseases.
4. Bureau of economics.

It investigates crop and market conditions throughout the world, disseminates information, and keeps the agricultural classes in every nation informed and advised in relation to matters affecting the interests of agriculture. It was Lubin's dream to found an institute that would enable farmers on one side of the globe to know what farmers on the other side of the globe were producing and at what cost. His dream was realized, and he lived to see this institute firmly established and efficiently functioning as a worthwhile aid to the agricultural classes in every land.

Here is a benevolent activity that the American people know but little about, and yet it is rendering them a very valuable service. Some of the most valuable agricultural statistics in relation to crop and market conditions abroad come not from our Department of Agriculture but from the International Institute of Agriculture at Rome, founded by the genius of this Polish Jew. He not only gave the world this institution, but he served his day and generation in many other ways. He introduced the rural credit system in the United States. He was largely responsible for the extension of the parcel post to farmers. He promoted the plan of direct buying and selling of agricultural products through the mails. He organized some of the first and most successful farmers' cooperative associations. He was a pioneer in our national marketing activities, based on the German Landwirtschaftsrat.

It is proper for us to pause at the conclusion of the reading of this paragraph to pay a tribute of respect to this public benefactor and call the attention of the Nation to the very valuable services rendered by this Jewish immigrant, not only to the people of America but to the people of the world. As a result of his vision, genius, and indomitable activity, this International Institute of Agriculture is serving not only the United States but serving 52 other commonwealths of the world. His successful life and accomplishments demonstrate that genius is not limited by national or racial lines and that under our benign governmental institutions the humblest man, though a penniless Polish immigrant, may rise above his environment, attain distinction, acceptably serve his day and generation, and earn a place in history and in the affections of a grateful people.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. LOZIER. Yes.

Mr. KETCHAM. The gentleman stated a moment ago that the statistics coming to us in respect to agriculture as a result of the institute at Rome are more valuable than those gathered by the Department of Agriculture here at home. That might have been true in the earlier days; but has the gentleman given very careful attention to the statistics that have come in the last year or two, since we have established our foreign offices of the Department of Agriculture, which, by the way, were the direct outgrowth of this very movement?

Mr. LOZIER. Mr. Chairman, the statement of the gentleman from Michigan is correct. Until a few years ago practically all of the statistics we had as to crop production and market conditions abroad came to us through the International Institute of Agriculture at Rome; but, as the gentleman says, in the last year or two we have been getting many valuable statistical data direct from foreign representatives of our Department of Agriculture.

The Clerk read as follows:

For participation by the United States in the Conference for Revision of the International Radiotelegraph Convention of November 25, 1927, to be held in Madrid, Spain, including personal services, without reference to the classification act of 1923, as amended, and rent in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, stenographic reporting and translating services by contract if deemed necessary without regard to section 3709 of the Revised Statutes (U. S. C., title 41, sec. 5); traveling expenses and subsistence or per diem in lieu of subsistence (notwithstanding the provisions of the subsistence expense act of 1926 or regulations prescribed pursuant thereto); hire of automobiles; purchase of necessary books and documents; stationery; official cards; newspapers and periodicals; printing and binding; entertainment; equipment; and such other expenses as may be authorized by the Secretary of State, including the reimbursement of other appropriations from which payments may have been made for any of the purposes herein specified, to be immediately available, $90,000.

Mr. KETCHAM. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In line with the questions propounded concerning some other international items, will the gentleman from Alabama take a moment or two to explain this one, which seems to be relatively new? I think a statement should be made in the RECORD in regard to this expenditure, which seems rather large.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. One of the conventions was held in Washington, and the one for which this appropriation is carried is considered very important. Many questions will be discussed and acted on that might be very prejudicial to our own country, if the action was unfavorable to us. Senator WHITE, who was the former chairman of the legislative committee, and, I think, Mr. DAVIS, the present chairman of the committee, have both expressed great interest in this appropriation being carried. Of course, all they wanted was to get a sufficient amount to insure a representative delegation. The gentleman will find a very interesting statement by Senator WHITE in the hearings relative to this matter.

Mr. KETCHAM. The urgency for it is because of the rapid development in this field and our leadership in it?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. We are simply compelled to have international understandings with reference to this matter; otherwise they could absolutely destroy the rights of this country in the air.

Mr. KETCHAM. That is to say, unless we are in on the conference, radio stations might be established immediately adjoining the boundaries of the United States and interfere with and possibly destroy our activities in that respect.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Unquestionably so.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

For annual contribution toward the support of the Somerset Hospital (a foreign hospital), at Cape Town, $50, to be paid by the Secretary of State upon the assurance that suffering seamen and citizens of the United States will be admitted to the privileges of said hospital.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, to ask the Chairman to explain this item. I do not see why there is only $50 appropriated to one foreign hospital for suffering seamen and citizens.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. That is a treaty obligation.

Mr. GOSS. And that occurs only in this one country, Africa?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes; that is the only one.

Mr. GOSS. How is it taken care of in other countries?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I am not prepared to state about any other countries, but this is the only contribution we are required to make to any hospital by treaty in this bill.

Mr. GOSS. It is just a gratuity, and for that they agree to take in our seamen?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. What happens to our seamen and citizens in other countries?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Well, we have another fund for that, and any consul is required to send them back home and to find work for them on the returning ships, if possible.

Mr. GOSS. I was wondering why we singled out Cape Town, Africa.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. There happens to be a hospital there, and under a treaty we make this contribution for its maintenance.

Mr. GOSS. And that is the only one we make?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The only one I know of.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

The Clerk read as follows:

Convention relating to the liquor traffic in Africa: To meet the share of the United States in the expenses for the calendar year 1933 of the Central International Office, created under article 7 of the convention of September 10, 1919, relating to the liquor traffic in Africa, $55.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Has the chairman any explanation of the $55 contribution to a country, relating to the liquor traffic in Africa? What is that item?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. It is a treaty obligation.

Mr. GOSS. We are interested in liquor in Africa?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. No. This appears in the hearings:

A central international office for the repression of the slave trade was established in Brussels, Belgium, under the general act of Brussels of July 2, 1890, to which act the United States was a signatory power. This central office dealt with the question of the traffic in slaves, arms and ammunition, and spirituous liquor in Africa.

Then the provision of the article is given. This is a treaty obligation.

Mr. GOSS. But it says in the bill, relating to liquor traffic in Africa, $55, but it does not mention slavery, and so forth. Are we putting all the money now into prohibition problems of Africa?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. It just happens to be carried that way by the State Department and has been carried in that form for a number of years.

The pro forma amendment was withdrawn.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words, and I ask unanimous consent to speak out of order on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Wisconsin?

There was no objection.

Mr. SCHAFER. Mr. Chairman, I want to bring to the attention of the membership of the House some good, sound Hearst doctrine, in view of the fact that the distinguished gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON] yesterday praised certain views of Hon. William Randolph Hearst. I want to read into the RECORD an editorial appearing in the Washington Times, one of the Hearst newspapers, issued February 19, 1932, which reads as follows:

MILLIONS FOR PROHIBITION "ENFORCEMENT"—NO SAVINGS PERMITTED THERE

Fanaticism or stupidity—or both—reach a climax in the decision of the House Appropriations Committee that no cut shall be made in the funds for prohibition enforcement, though the funds for every other branch of Government are being drastically scaled down.

As a sample of sheer idiocy we commend the committee report to our readers.

The committee says:

"This is the only item about which there was disagreement. Two members felt that the amount should be reduced. The majority, however, felt that as this appropriation is for the enforcement of a law which presents unusual difficulties at times in its enforcement the appropriation should not be reduced."

We wonder at what time the enforcement of the law does not present unusual difficulties.

We wonder at what time the enforcement of the law is not 99 per cent impossible.

If the committee will clear that point up for the country, it will perform a public service.

The country is under the impression that anybody can get a drink if he wants it, and the country happens to be right.

However, the appropriation was reported favorably, and no doubt will be authorized by the House.

In this same bill which makes the next fiscal year safe for Mr. Woodcock and his 2,000 agents the fund for the establishment and maintenance of the Department of Commerce airways was slashed $1,500,000.

That stroke of "economy" will prevent any extension of the existing lines for a year and will be a severe setback to the established airways, over which more than half of the Nation's air mail is carried at night.

The Army and Navy, which are vital to the Nation's safety, have been reduced already to a point where it is doubtful if they can perform their mission.

All civil employees of the Government, except the prohibition agents, face the prospect of a pay cut which, if made, will encourage every private firm in the land to follow suit—thereby reducing the public's buying power still farther.

Yet the holy work of closing up a few night clubs and nabbing a few small-fry bootleggers must go on. There must be no scrimping or saving there, no matter how vast the deficit may grow.

You can understand now why Will Rogers, in a candid moment, referred to his native country as "Cuckooland."

If this is a fair sample of the way we manage our affairs, Mr. Rogers paid us too big a compliment.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. SCHAFER. I yield.

Mr. GOSS. We are right at that point in this appropriation bill now, where we are appropriating $55, relating to the liquor traffic in Africa.

Mr. SCHAFER. Oh, that is merely a drop in the bucket when compared with the total amount provided for prohibition in the pending bill. It is rather remarkable that the economy experts of the Democratic Party, led by the honorable Speaker of the House, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BYRNS], the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BLANTON], and the gentleman from Arizona [Mr. DOUGLAS], have allowed their eagle eyes to pass over the expenditures in the Prohibition Department when they are continually asking for a reduction in appropriations of other branches of the Government. The editorial I have just read hits the nail squarely on the head. I can realize the attitude of these gentlemen, because the facts in their records do not indicate that they are for rigid economy. In the Seventieth Congress, second session, three of these four horsemen, the gentleman from Tennessee and the two gentlemen from Texas, who are now leading the Democratic economy-propaganda agency, voted to foist upon the President of the United States $24,000,000 for prohibition enforcement, in addition to the regular appropriation, without having estimates or a request for that amount from the department or from the President. So we can not consider all of the present Democratic economy war cries for political effect as positions of those who really want to balance the Budget and reduce the cost of government. Let me suggest to the gentlemen that if they desire to balance the Budget, repeal the prohibition monstrosity and save many millions of dollars in enforcement each year, and enact a bill taxing alcoholic beverages and put four or five hundred million dollars in the Treasury each year, which will help balance the Budget. [Applause.]

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I know the gentleman from Wisconsin would not knowingly violate the spirit of an agreement, and I am sure the gentleman was present when I stated to the House the substance of an agreement had with Representatives on both sides of the aisle, in reference to the prohibition amendment. It was that all discussion of the prohibition item and all amendments thereto should be limited to two hours on Tuesday, on which date, if reached, it would be passed. I hope that all Members will observe the agreement. I acquit the gentleman from Wisconsin from any violation of it, because I assume the gentleman did not know of the agreement.

Mr. SCHAFER. The gentleman from Wisconsin was not present in the Chamber at the time. He was very busy going over a transcript of the hearings conducted by the Committee on Expenditures in the Executive Departments on the bill to consolidate the Army and Navy.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I acquit the gentleman absolutely of any conscious violation, even of the spirit of the agreement, and am simply calling attention to it in order that we may hereafter defer all discussion of that part of the bill until next Tuesday.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. GOSS. In view of the gentleman's remarks, does he not think that this particular paragraph might come within that prohibition, where it relates to the liquor traffic in Africa? That might also go over until Tuesday for a vote.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. This is a treaty obligation. I felt we had entered into a very fair agreement, satisfactory to both sides, with a view of enabling many Members to make other engagements and not be here to-day.

Mr. GOSS. If the gentleman thinks it more of a treaty than a prohibition question, I withdraw my parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words and I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes out of order. I am told that an amendment is to be offered to strike out certain provisos on page 121, and I would like the privilege of addressing the committee for five minutes in that connection.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes out of order. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I merely desire to call to the attention of the committee the fact that on Tuesday or Wednesday an amendment will be offered, or a number of amendments will be offered on both sides of the committee, to strike from this bill the two provisos at the bottom of page 121. The two provisos are aimed at the United States Employment Service, which I contend, as one Member of the House, has been doing and is doing a very valuable public service. If the two provisos do not completely annihilate the United States Employment Service, they are a mistake, because I think that is what they are intended to do.

In the first place, the proviso reduces the salaries of 119 field employees, reducing their salaries anywhere from 10 to 50 per cent. I think that is wrong at this time. We need all of the virility and enthusiastic support in the Employment Service that it is possible to get, and I do not think that wages in employment's interest should be reduced at this time. There is another proviso to the effect that after a certain date no employment office shall be maintained where it is necessary to pay rent for the office. I have checked over the office rents, and I find that they run anywhere from $25 a month to $70 or $80 a month. Most of them pay $300 or $400 a year under a lease.

To suggest to the Employment Service that it go to a Federal building, to an American Legion post, or to a State employment office and there find desk room in order to do the very valuable work it is doing and is expected to do at this time, when unemployment is at its height, I think is a wrong policy and can only be directed at the destruction of the whole service, which, under a man by the name of John M. Alpine, has done remarkable work and has a record which establishes a very high mark for Government service.

I will say to gentlemen on the floor that I do not even know the name of the man who is the director or manager of the employment office in my district, or in the city of Chicago. It is not in my district at all. I give you my word of honor that I do not know his name or where his office is. I do not know what salary he is getting. But my thought is that at this time, when we are not cutting salaries, when we are not cutting our own salaries, why should we single out these 119 men in this important service and reduce their salaries, unless it is to destroy the value of their positions entirely? If the subcommittee reporting this proviso wants to annihilate completely that bureau, why not take the $802,000 which is carried in this bill and wipe it out of existence? Either the Employment Service is good or it is bad. If it is bad, it should be discontinued. I have every regard for the convictions and opinions of the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER]. We have served together in this House for 20 years, a large part of that time on one committee. I regard his opinion highly; he is honest, capable, courageous, and a straight shooter. If he wants to annihilate this Employment Service, let him come upon the floor and tell us why it should be discontinued and make a motion to strike out the $802,000 and save that amount for the Treasury. That is the proper way to reach this situation. But I contend it is a valuable service. I contend that John Alpine is making a great record for himself and for the service. The report which he submitted to the Subcommittee on Appropriations showed that during 1931 they found some 700,000 placements, as they are called—jobs for people. If they can do that, I do not think this is the time to suggest a reduction in their already small salaries or that they can only do business where they can get rent free, especially when you take into consideration the fact that they are only paying from $25 to $80 a month.

[Here the gavel fell.]

Mr. BRITTEN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for one additional minute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. BRITTEN. I hope when the amendment is offered on the floor next Tuesday to strike out those two provisos, it will prevail. Such action will be in the interest of good, sound business economy. At a time like this we should not do anything to damage a valuable service in a false interest of economy.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BRITTEN. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that there is a proviso on page 63 with reference to district offices. I hope the gentleman will include that in his amendment.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Mr. Chairman, I think it would be proper at this time to read what my limited time this morning would not permit me to do before the bill was taken up under the 5-minute rule. I wish to read the committee's report, not for the purpose of making at this time any comment thereon, but simply that this statement by the committee may appear in the RECORD before the item is reached. The statement reads:

It will be recalled that this appropriation was first carried during the closing years of the war, and the money then appropriated was used to find workers for jobs. Later, as the annual appropriations were greatly reduced, the activities of this service were largely confined in providing laborers to meet the seasonal demands of the farmers of the West, Southwest, and Mid West. The appropriation is now employed in the effort to find jobs for the unemployed. Naturally this purpose makes a very strong human appeal to Members of Congress. Just before the holidays $120,000 additional was carried as a deficiency appropriation on the urgent request of the department. At that time the Secretary of Commerce and the Director of the Employment Service stated to the committee they would not ask that the Budget estimate for 1933—which carried less than was regularly appropriated for 1932—be increased. They made the further statement that it was not contemplated paying salaries at any new office to be established in excess of $2,000. Congress, it will be recalled, placed a limitation to this effect on the appropriation, and this bill carries a similar limitation as to all salaries at employment offices after the beginning of the next fiscal year, and also a further limitation against the payment of any rents.

The only reduction which the committee has made in the amount as recommended by the Budget is in the item of rent, resulting from the limitation just referred to, and reflecting a saving if the rent limitation is approved.

There are members of the committee who believe, however, that additional and substantial reductions should be made in this appropriation, yet since the House has recently favored a deficiency appropriation the committee feels that further reductions in the Budget estimate should be left to the determination of the House. The hearings carry a very informing statement from the capable director of this service, to which the attention of the Members is invited.

Though this report from the director shows outstanding accomplishments, yet it must be remembered that this is a social service where splendid and helpful cooperation is extended by chambers of commerce, civic, charity, and welfare organizations, and it is the thought of the committee that after July 1, 1932, all the communities throughout the country will be sufficiently stimulated to take over and care for, in a very large way, the purposes sought to be accomplished with this appropriation.

The attention of the House is especially called to the splendid work of the Legion in this connection and to the practical plans formulated and effectively carried out by volunteer organizations in the city of Rochester and the county of Monroe, N. Y., where the slogan seems to be, "We must and will find every possible job that our people can provide for the unemployed." This plan, we are glad to note, is being rapidly extended to other communities. It is the thought of members of the committee that there must be a limit placed on the time when large appropriations of this kind can be effectively used, and the splendid efforts that volunteer organizations throughout the country are now putting forward have led us to conclude that some substantial reduction in this appropriation may be made after July 1, 1932.

It will be noted from the hearings that the number on the pay roll under this appropriation is rapidly increasing in every State, and we recognize this presents difficulties, based on human equations, that may make it hard to reduce this appropriation, but may we not hope that such difficulties are more apparent than real.

Mr. BRITTEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. BRITTEN. I have read that statement. The difference between the statement and the facts is that the statement refers to new field positions carrying a salary not in excess of $2,000, while the language in the bill reduces the salaries of the 119 men who are already in the field. There is a great difference. If the gentleman's proviso in the bill is to care for new employees, that is one matter, but the bill actually reduces the salaries of 119 men already employed.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I am sure the gentleman can not complain when I am willing that the very persuasive speech that he is always able to make shall now remain with the committee without any reply other than the report of the committee, until taken up later. I am willing to wait to present the committee's views when the item is reached.

The Clerk read as follows:

Salaries and expenses: For salaries and expenses in connection with the supervision of the maintenance and care of United States prisoners, including not to exceed $199,240 for personal services in the District of Columbia and elsewhere, traveling expenses, and expenses of attendance at meetings concerned with the work of such bureau when authorized by the Attorney General, $239,650.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman from Alabama if there are any changes in the amounts provided for with respect to the items just read by the Clerk under the Bureau of Prisons?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes; there is a reduction under the Budget estimate of $16,000.

Mr. DYER. May I ask the gentleman what that reduction is?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. They wanted a farm superviser at $4,600; there were one or two clerical employees asked for, and I think there were two additional jail inspectors requested, and we denied all of the new employees.

Mr. DYER. The gentleman and his committee, I take it, felt this was justified, of course, or they would not have taken such action?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes. At every prison they have a farm superintendent and assistant, and we did not believe at this time we should provide for a new position carrying a salary of $4,600 to travel out of Washington. The Department of Agriculture lends helpful assistance at any time through its many agents scattered throughout the country.

Then with respect to the jail inspectors, they now have six, and we did not feel they should have two additional. In reference to the clerical help, I recognize the work of this department is heavy, but so is that of Members of Congress, and they now have a very ambitious organization. There are 65 in the District and the salary roll is about $195,000.

I can go more fully into the matter if that is desired, but the committee felt fully justified in denying the increases.

Mr. DYER. The Bureau of Prisons, of course, was recently established by the Congress and had for its purpose a more efficient administration of the prisons.

I would like to ask the gentleman as to his judgment of the effect of the change that Congress made.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. It has been very beneficial. I think the director of the bureau, Mr. Bates, for whom I have the highest regard, is very capable and has accomplished a wonderful work.

Mr. DYER. I am very glad to have that judgment from the gentleman from Alabama touching the director of the bureau, because at the time he was selected a very careful survey of the whole country was made to find the man best fitted for this special work.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Every member of the committee was favorably impressed by the report of Mr. Bates.

Mr. DYER. The committee of which I have the honor to be a member brought in this legislation to create the bureau and strengthen and facilitate the work. I am glad to have from the gentleman from Alabama, who is a careful student, and knowing the care which he exercises over the expenses of the judiciary, that he has the opinion which he has expressed. The gentleman thinks the bureau can do without this additional money?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I think so.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to return to page 35, the paragraph relating to the Department of Justice.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. CROWTHER. Mr. Chairman, I want to pay a tribute to a remarkable service that Mr. Lawrence and his assistants have rendered to the Government. During the making of the Hawley-Smoot bill, following the hearings, Mr. Lawrence and his two assistants gave us—and, I presume, rendered the same assistance to the subcommittee who had the schedule in charge—a wonderful service. It was very enlightening, very informing, and very helpful to us.

You see, what we were trying to do was to write the schedules so as to avoid the pitfalls and the wide-open places that the customs attorneys drag their clients through in order to avoid the payment of duties, by putting them into a lower classification. On every item Mr. Lawrence and his assistants presented us with cases that had developed during the adjudication and progress of the tariff legislation and showed us where the loopholes were.

The difficulty always was to determine the intent of Congress. In performing this work Mr. Lawrence and his assistants sometimes worked with us until 1 and 2 o'clock in the morning in attempting to rectify the errors and assisting us to prepare the bill.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. While I was not strongly in sympathy with the bill to which the gentleman refers, I have known Mr. Lawrence for a number of years, and I feel that he has been of very great assistance and very efficient in the discharge of his important duties. We gave him one additional assistant at this time, but do not feel justified in giving two assistants.

Mr. CROWTHER. I am glad to know that, because I think he is deserving. In spite of all our care in rewriting the sections (there were very few) new ones, except we introduced a rayon schedule, in spite of the care exercised, there were piled up last year 70,000 appeals, showing that no matter how careful you are you can not get away from the doubt as to just what Congress intended by the language of the law.

That is another indication, if you follow it out to its last analysis, that our tariff bills are lower than they really seem, because every time a case is won the duty is lowered because a new classification and standard is accomplished.

If we win one, we do not gain anything, because the record stands as it is in the paragraph, and, constantly, with the adjudication of these cases, we are losing a little and the tariff is dropping down a little month after month as the cases are adjudicated.

I am glad that the committee saw fit to grant the assistance to this committee, because actually they are producing revenue for the Government; they are at least saving money.

I call the gentleman's attention to a case that occurred here a few years ago. It could only have occurred under the circumstances that existed at that time. An importation was made into this country by an importing concern that was evidently a dummy importing corporation, of 1,760,000 blankets, supplied by the English Government to the French Army. We at that time sold about $4,000,000,000 worth of material for about $400,000,000 to the French. This corporation went over there and brought them to the United States, but before they brought them in they found that the duty in the tariff bill was 18 cents a pound and 30 per cent ad valorem. The importers paid for them to France 6 francs apiece, which is about 30 cents apiece, as the franc was only worth about 5 cents. That would have been 90 cents and 9 cents ad valorem.

However, a brilliant customs attorney said that he could show them how to bring them in more cheaply. He told them to work a little woolen initial with woolen yarn on in one corner and bring them into the country as embroidered articles under paragraph 1430 of the sundry schedule where the duty is 75 per cent ad valorem, an equitable duty for goods that we expected to come in under that paragraph, but when you had a 30-cent value with a 75 per cent ad valorem duty, it amounted to only 22½ cents. They brought those into the United States, and although there was appeal after appeal taken, it never did get to the courts, and that cost the Government $1,260,000 in loss of duty alone.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Members of the committee have diligently inquired always into whether a law that Congress has passed is being enforced, and we have sought to strengthen the hands of every law officer, and in this case when Mr. Lawrence, who is a very capable official, brought to our attention the need of an assistant, we gave him one.

Mr. CROWTHER. I thank the gentleman.

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. DYER. I understand the Assistant Attorney General, Mr. Lawrence, receives a salary of $9,000?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. That is fixed by the Attorney General. I do not recall the salary, but think it is $9,000.

Mr. DYER. I agree with what has been said by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CROWTHER] and the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. OLIVER] in reference to the Assistant Attorney General, Mr. Lawrence. There has been probably no more capable or able servant of the Government than the Assistant Attorney General, Mr. Lawrence. He is an indefatigable worker and is very efficient. When a man renders service as he does, and is worth as much as he is to the Government, he ought to have the very best assistance and encouragement in doing what he is doing, and he ought to have a decent, living salary. I hope he is getting the $9,000.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. That is a matter in the hands of the Attorney General, but my recollection is that the salary of Mr. Lawrence is $9,000.

The Clerk read as follows:

For such miscellaneous expenses as may be authorized or approved by the Attorney General, for the United States courts and their officers, including experts at such rates of compensation as may be authorized or approved by the Attorney General, including also so much as may be necessary in the discretion of the Attorney General for such expenses in the District of Alaska and in courts other than Federal courts, and including traveling expenses pursuant to the subsistence expense act of 1926 (U. S. C., title 5, ch. 16), $1,160,000: Provided, That the maximum salary paid to any law clerk to any circuit judge shall not exceed $2,400 per annum.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Does this limitation of $2,400 per annum cut down any existing salaries?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes; it cuts down law clerks to $2,400 a year.

Mr. GOSS. What is the salary now?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. This is a new position, and the law provided that the salary should not exceed $3,000. They were started at $3,000, and the committee felt that $2,400 should be the maximum limit. The initial pay should be about $2,000.

Mr. GOSS. Are there any receiving $3,000?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. GOSS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. Goss: Page 44, line 21, strike out "$2,400" and insert "$3,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Prison industries working capital fund: Prison industries working capital fund, 1932 and prior years, is reappropriated and made available for the fiscal year 1933, including payment of obligations incurred in prior years; and the said working capital fund and all receipts credited thereto may be used as a revolving fund for the fiscal year 1933, for the purposes authorized by the act entitled "An act to provide for the diversification of employment of Federal prisoners, for their training and schooling in trades and occupations, and for other purposes," approved May 27, 1930 (U. S. C., Supp. V, title 18, secs. 744d, 744e, 744f).

Mr. DYER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

With reference to the items which we have been reading, and those which are to follow, touching appropriations for United States penitentiaries, industrial institutions, and so forth, for the care of prisoners in those places and also in jails, can the gentleman from Alabama tell us something about the amount of increase to the Government for matters of this kind in the last few years?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I went into that fully in my general statement this morning.

Mr. DYER. I am sorry I did not hear the gentleman. I will not take up the time to go over it again at this time, but it has been greatly increased, has it not?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Very greatly increased, and we are here calling a halt for the reasons I stated, that it does not now appear that we will require the same number of prisons in 1933 that it was thought in 1930 were required. So we have recommended some cuts in prison expansion.

Mr. DYER. For instance, the one at Springfield, Mo.?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. We there recommended that no amount be appropriated at this time for the tubercular hospital.

Mr. DYER. It is not the intention, of course, to abandon it?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. That is a matter that Congress will determine later. In the first place, the contract that has been let for the main hospital has not yet commenced, and the gentleman will note that 430 days are given under the contract to complete it. That runs into 1934, and we thought that at the next session Congress could determine whether to make additional expenditures there. Then there were further considerations that entered into our decision.

Mr. DYER. I do not want to ask the gentleman to go all over this again, but I take it that the gentleman agrees with my judgment that the expense has largely increased?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Oh, there is no question about that.

Mr. DYER. Principally due to prohibition; is that not the fact?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. That is one of the factors.

Mr. DYER. And a very large factor.

Mr. GOSS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. GOSS. With reference to the salaries and wages of officers and employees mentioned in these many paragraphs, have the wages or salaries been reduced at all?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I do not think there are any reductions. We have made no reductions in salaries except as pointed out. As far as we can learn, in the Department of Commerce there must be some separations from the service, because we have made reductions, and so did the Bureau of the Budget, which will cause some separations from the service.

Mr. GOSS. But there are no general reductions?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. There are no general reductions except where attention has been called to it. We called attention to the one with reference to law clerks in the report. We also called attention to the salaries of the joint commission, and wherever we made reductions in salary they were called attention to in the report, as I recall.

Mr. DYER. Is that true as to the probation system?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes. We made that a maximum of $2,600. I called attention to that in the House in my remarks this morning.

Permit me to say that in view of the fact that there are two hospitals in which there is some interest felt, and since I did not have an opportunity earlier of making a statement with reference to them, and some Members desire to discuss these two matters, I am willing that those two items, if the committee approves, may go over until Monday afternoon to be taken up at that time, so that the interested Members may have full opportunity to read the hearings and present their case. We do not want to do injustice to anyone, or to any service. I shall be very glad, if that is the desire of the gentlemen interested in these matters, to request the committee to permit these two items to go over until Monday.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. Will the gentleman yield for an explanation? I appreciate the gentleman's statement, and that will be agreeable to me.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. The two matters which I thought perhaps Members would be interested in and where we have made some large cuts is the hospital at Springfield, Mo., and the institution in Ohio. I felt, in fairness to the gentlemen, that I would like to have them read the hearings and then if they do not agree with the committee, let the House determine the matter after discussion.

Mr. THATCHER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I yield.

Mr. THATCHER. That is in the Justice Department bill?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes. I made a statement about it this morning.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. May I make this statement, that it is my purpose to offer an amendment on page 52, in line 16, increasing the appropriation to the amount that the Budget recommended.

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. I am perfectly willing to take it up now and dispose of it, but I thought the gentleman might prefer reading the hearings and present his amendment later.

Mr. JOHNSON of Missouri. Then it will go over until Monday?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.

Mr. DYER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. OLIVER of Alabama. Yes.
